"On the two great continents in the northern hemisphere but not in the broken land of Europe between them: we have the zone of perpetually frozen undergrowth in a low latitude."—Darwin: Voyage Round the World (ed. 1870), ch. xi. p. 249.
(c) Rough, intersected with hills and small valleys.
(2) Of animals: Weakened, enfeebled.
"More especially amongst broken and failing groups of organic beings."—Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 1872), ch. xiv. p. 400.
(3) Of food, &c.: Meat that has been cut up: fragments of meat. Also applied to fragments of food of any kind, not necessarily meat.
"And they did all eat, and were filled: and they took up of the broken meat that was left seven baskets full." Mark xv. 37.
¶ Similarly remnants of beer were formerly called broken-beer.
2. Of immaterial things:
(1) Crushed in spirit.
(a) Of persons:
"... reduced in numbers and broken in spirit."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng. ch. xiv.
(b) Of the heart, &c.:
"A broken and a contrite heart."—Psalms li. 17.
(2) Uttered disjointedly, ejaculated, uttered in a broken voice.
"Broken prayers to God, that He would judge him and this Cause."—Carlyle: Heroes, Lect. vi.
3. Of promises, laws, &c.: Violated, unfulfilled, unobserved.

* God pardon all oathes that are broke to me
Shakesp.: Rich. II., iv. 1.

4. Of weather: Rough, unsettled.

"The weather proved broken and rainy."—Scott: Justice Arg. ch. xxxvii

5. Of health: Weakened, failing. [BROKEN-DOWN.]

B. Technically:

1. Comm.: Bankrupt. (Colloquial.)

"... and whether Linton be not yet broke?"—Pope: Letter to Jervas (1714).

"But he is abroad: the place is to be sold.
John. Oh, lies. He was not broken.
Thompson: Walking to the Mall.

2. Music:

(1) Of a cadence: Interrupted.

(2) Of chords: Arpeggio

(3) Of time: Unobserved, unkept.

"Ha, ha! keep time: how sour sweet music is,
When time is broke, and no proportion kept!"
Shakesp.: Rich. II., v. 5.

(4) Arranged for several instruments.

"And so, likewise, in that music which we call broken music or consort music, some consorts of instruments are sweeter than others, a thing not sufficiently yet observed."—Bacon: Works (ed. 1765), vol. i.

(5) Played on harps, guitars, or lutes, because the sounds of these instruments cannot be sustained at will. (Stainer & Barrett.)

3. Painting. Of colours: Those produced by the mixture of different pigments.

4. Arith. Of a number: A fraction.

5. Dioptrics: The line into which an incident ray is "broken" or refracted in crossing the second medium.

6. Naut. Of water: The contention of currents in a narrow channel. Also, the waves breaking on or near shallows, choppy water.

7. Mil.: Cashiered. (Colloquial.)

8. Bot. Of a whorl: Not on the same plane, but constituting part of an exceedingly short spiral. (Treas. of Bot.)

9. Comp. Grammar.: Not distinct in sound or value.

"... exhibit the greatest proclivity towards the use of these broken vowels."—Beames: Comp. Gram. Aryan Lang. of India, vol. i. (1875), ch. ii., p. 141.

10. Of language: Not fluent, ungrammatical.

"Break thy mind to me in broken English."
Shakesp.: Henry V., v. 2.

broken-backed, * broke bakkyde, * broke bak, a.

1. Ord. Lang.: Having a broken back, crippled. (Lit. & fig.)

"Broke bakkyde. Gibbosus."—Prompt. Parv.

"Quel mare vous aile, harengnes, that now here be!
But broke-back scherreve, evel mot thou the!
Chaucer: C. T. 7518.

"A few even sprawl-out helplessly on all sides, quite broken-backed and dismembered."—Carlyle: Sartor Resartus, bk. i., ch. iv.

2. Naut.: The state of a ship so loosened in her frame by age, weakness, or some great strain from grounding amidships, as to droop at each end, causing the lines of her sheer to be interrupted, and termed hogged. (Smyth.)

* broken-bellied, a.

1. Lit.: Ruptured

2. Fig.: Deformed, corrupted

"Such a one as broken-bellied age that this ulcuscle is turned into a carbuncle: and we term those most natural which are most veritable."—Sir M. Sandys: Essays, p. 156.

broken-down, a. Which has failed or become useless from breaking down, either literally or from disease or other cause broken-footed, a. Having deformed or crippled feet.

"I left Oxfordshire Hall on the back of a broken down hunter, with ten guineas in my purse."—Scott: Rob Roy, ch. ii.

"Or a man that is broken-footed or broken handed."—Lev. xxi. 19.

broken-handed, a. Crippled in the hand. (See quotation under broken-footed.)

broken-hearted, a. Having the spirits broken or crushed through grief or anxiety. [BROKEN, A., II. 2 (1) (b).]

"He hath sent me to bind up the broken hearted."—Isa. lxi. 1.

broken-legged, * broke-legged, a. Having the leg or legs broken or crippled

"If he be blynd or broke legged."
Langland: Piers Plowman, 4,066.

† broken-man, s. An outlaw, bankrupt.

"... baited the grandsword to his side, took to the broken-ends, and became a broken man."—Scott: Rob Roy, ch. xxvi.

broken-spirited, a. Having the spirits crushed by fear or trouble; broken-hearted

"Humbled and broken-spirited, yet glad that they had come off so well, they stole forth through the crowd of stern fanatics."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

Naut.: The space in a ship not filled by her cargo. (Wharton.) broken twill, s.

Fabrics: A variety of twill or textile fabrics.

broken-winded, a. [BROKENWINDED.]

† brōk'-en-ly, adv. [Eng. broken; -ly.]

1. Not continuously, interruptedly

"Sir Richard Roghame hath done somewhat of this kind, but brokenly and glancingly."—Ridewell.

2. In a broken or crushed state, broken-hearted.

"And thus the heart will break, yet brokenly live on."
Byron: Childe Harold's Pilg., iii. 32.

3. In broken language; not fluently

"King. O fair Katharine, if you will love me soundly with your French heart, I will be glad to hear you confess it brokenly with your English tongue."—Shakesp. Hen. V., v. 2.

† brōk'-en-nĕss, s. [Eng. broken; -ness.] The quality or state of being broken. (Lit. & fig.)

"Those infirmities that are incident to them [the teeth] whether hoarseness, hollowness, rottenness, brokenness."—Sinai & Old Age, p. 20.

"It is the brokenness, the ungrammatical position, the total subversion of the period that charms me."—Gray: Letter to Mason.

brōk'-en-wind, s. [Eng. broken; wind.]

Farriery: A disease of the organs of respiration in horses.

brōk-ĕn-wind'-ĕd, * brōke'-wind-ĕd, a.

1. Farr.: Suffering from broken wind; affected in the organs of respiration.

2. Fig.: Dull, heavy.

"Brokewindad murmure, howlings and sad groanes."
May: Lucan, bk. v.

brōk'-ĕr, s. [In Fr. brocanteur.] [BROCAGE.]

1. One who acts in business for another, a middle-man, agent, or commissioner.

"Brokers, who, having no stock of their own, set up and trade with that of other men: buying here, and selling there, and commonly abusing both sides to make out a little paultry gain."—Temple.

2. One who deals in merchandise or securities, acting as agent between the seller and the buyer, or between the importer and the consumer. [STOCK BROKER.]

* 3. An agent generally, a go-between.

"... a person who had long acted as a broker between Jacobite plotters and people who dealt in cutlery and firearms."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

* 4. A match-maker, a pimp, a pander of either sex; a bawd, a procuress

"Of brokeris and ale baudry how sould I write?
Of quham the fylth stynkis in Goddis nese."
Doug.: Virgil, 96, 51.

5. One who deals in old or second-hand goods.

6. One licensed to value or sell goods on which distraint has been made.

brōk ĕr ăġe, s. [Eng. broker; and suffix -age (q.v.).]

* 1. The business or profession of a broker.

2. The pay or commission received by brokers

"The compensation, which they allow in this plan to their masters for their brokerage, is, that if (after deducting all the charges which they impose) the amount of the sales should be found to exceed two shillings and two pence for the current rupee of the invoice account, it shall be taxed by the Company."—Burke: Works, vol. ix., p. 72.

* brōk ĕr-ĭ̆y, a. [Eng. broker; -ly.] Like a broker, hence, mean

"We had determin'd that thou shouldst ha come,
In a pitiful suit, and ha carried her so, and he,
A brokerly slave, goes, puts it on himself.
Ben Jonson: Alchemist, iv. 4.

* brōk'-ĕr-ў, * brōk'-ĕr-ĭe, s. [Eng. broker; -y.] The business or pursuit of a broker, brokerage.

"Let them alone for me, Baste their heads with deeper brokeries."
Bp. Hall: Sat. II. 2.

* brok-ĭl, a. [BRITTLE.]

* brōk'-ĭng, a. [BROKE, v.]

1. Practised by brokers, pertaining to brokers

"Redeem from broking pawn the blemish'd crown, Wipe off the dust that hides our sceptre's gilt."
Shakesp.: Rich. II., iii. 3.

2. Acting as a broker.

"Adieu, a drab, and filthy broking hostess."
Marston: Fawne, v. 1 (Collier).

* brŏkke, v.t. [Etymology doubtful. Compare Scotch brod, O. H. Ger. brocken, Ger. brocken.] To sing, carol.

"Ayo the evakoere to brokke." Chesham's p.

* brŏk hătte, * brŏk'i itt (pl. * brŏkkĭtte), s. [BRICKET.] A brocket, a deer two years old. (Doug.: Virgil, 402, 1 ...)

* brok'-king, pr. par. & a. [BROKE, v.] Quavering, throbbing

"He singeth brokking as a nightingale."
Chaucer: The Milleres Tale.

¶ Wright's edition reads: "He singeth crowning as a nightingale."

* brok-lembe, s. [A corruption of brocking (q.v.).]

* brok yll, a. [BRITTLE.] (Scotch.)

* brok yngе, pr. par. & a. [BROCK, v.]

A. As present participle: (See the verb.)

* B. As substantive: Digestion.

"Brokynge of mete and drinke."—Prompt. Parv.

* brol, * brell, * brolle, s. [Low Lat. brolla = poor, miserable contemptible thing, a brat.

"Of that baggares brol an eldest schal weddue, Piers Plowman's Creed, ...

"The leeste brol of his blood a lordes pere."
Langland: Piers Plowman, 4,767.

* brol-y yn, s. [BROIL, s.]

* brol-y-yngе, s. [BROILING, s.]

* brom, s. [BROOM.]

brōm-ăc'-ĕt-ăte, s. [Eng., Acet(ic) broma(ine); -ate.] A salt of bromacetic acid.

brōm-ă-çĕt'-ĭc, a. [Eng. brom(ine), & acetic.] Pertaining to or derived from bromine and acetic acid.

bromacetic acid, s. An acid obtained from a mixture of crystallizable acetic acid and bromine in the proportion of equivalents, introduced into a sealed tube, heated in an oil bath to 150° C.

brō-măl, s. [Eng., &c. brom(ine); al(dehyde).] Bromine, from aldehyde Chemistry: Also called Tribromal CBr_3COH, obtained by the action of Bromine, on absolute alcohol. It is a boiling at 172°, and unites with water to a solid hydrate which melts at 67° C. decomposed by alkalies into ... $HCO.OH$, and bromoform $CHBr_3$. It with hydrocyanic acid, forming $Br_3CH(C...$ which, by the action of acids is converted tribromolactic acid $CBr_3CH(OH)CO_2H$. By the action of nitric acid on Brol yields tribromacetic acid $CBr_3CO.OH$.

brō-măn-ĭl, s. [From Eng. brom(ine), and Port. anil = indigo.]

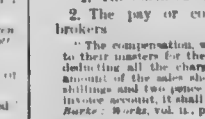
Chem.: An aromatic compound called also Tetrabromoquinone $C_6Br_4O_2$.



It is prepared by heating one part of phenol $C_6H_5(OH)$ with ten parts of bromine, three parts of iodine and water to 100°. It crystallises in golden yellow needles, which are sparingly soluble in cold ... alcohol.

brōm-ăr-gўr-ĭte, s. [Eng., &c. brom(ine); Gr. argyros = silver; and suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: The same as bromyrite (q.v.)

brō-măte, s. [Eng. brom(ine); -ate (Chem.).] A salt of bromic acid (q.v.)

* brō-mą-thĭ-ŏ-ў, s. [From Gr. bromē (brōma), genit. bromatos (= food) = meat which is eaten, food, meat; and logos = a discourse.] A discourse, dissertation, or treatise on aliments brōm hĕn-zēne, s. [Eng., &c. brom(ine); benzene.]

Chem.: A compound called also phenyl-bromide C_6H_5Br. It is a liquid boiling at 154, obtained by the action of daylight on a mixture of bromine and benzene; also by the action of PBr_5, phosphorus pentabromide on phenol $C_6H_5(OH)$.

brome (1), s. [Bromus.] (Prompt. Parv.) brome (2), s. & a. [In Fr. brome. From Gr. βρωμος (bromos) = a kind of oat.] [Bromine.]

A word used in the compound which follows.

Bot.: The English book-name for the genus Bromus (q.v.).

brō-mēl'-i-ā, s. [In Fr. bromélie. Named after Bromelius, who published a Gothic flora.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, the typical one of the order Bromeliaceæ (q.v.).

brō-mēl-i-ā'-ṣē-æ, s. pl. [From Lat., &c. bromelia (q.v.), and Lat. fem. pl. adjectival suffix -aceæ.]

Bot.: Bromeworts, an order of endogenous plants, placed by Dr. Lindley under his Sub-Class Albiflorae. The calyx is sometimes adherent, looking, but sometimes coloured. Petals, three, coloured; stamina, six or more, hairy, three-celled, many-seeded, as in the fruit, which is capsular or succulent. The stem is wanting or, if present, very short. Sometimes it consists of fibrous roots, consolidated round a slender centre with rigid channeled leaves spiny at the edge or point. The fruit is sometimes eatable. In 1847 Lindley estimated the known species at 170, all from America, where they have migrated to Africa, the East Indies, and elsewhere. The well-known pine-apple is the Bromelia Ananas Ananas. PINE-APPLE.] Ropes are made in Brazil from another species of the same genus. All the species of Bromeliaceæ can exist without contact with the earth; they are therefore suspended in South America in houses, or hung to the balustrades of balconies, whence they diffuse fragrance abroad.

brō mēl wōrts, s. pl. [From Lat. bromelia, and Eng. wort.]

Bot.: The English name given by Lindley to the natural order Bromeliaceæ.

brō-n hȳ-drīne, s. pl. [From Eng., &c. bromo-), hydr(ate); and suffix -in (Chem.) (q.v.).

Chem.: Haloidethers formed by replacing the 1, 2 or 3 (OH) radicals in the triatomic alcohol glycerin by Br. Monobromhydrin $CH_2Br\,CH\,(OH)\,CH_2(OH)$, an oily liquid boiling at 150, obtained by the action of HBr on glycerin $C_3H_5(OH)_3$. Symmetrical Dibromhydrin, $CH_2Br\,CH\,(OH)\,CH_2Br$, a liquid boiling at 219, obtained by the action of bromine on monobromhydrin. Unsymmetrical Dibromhydrin $CH_2Br\,CHBr\,CH_2(OH)$, boiling at 212 by the action of bromine on allyl alcohol $CH_2=CH\,CH_2(OH)$. Tribromhydrin or Allylbromide $CH_2Br\,CHBr\,CH_2Br$, a crystalline substance melting at 16°, and boiling at 220°; it is obtained by the action of excess of bromine on allyl iodide. [CHLORHYDRINS.]

brō mic, a. [From Eng., &c. brom(ine), and -ic.] Pertaining to bromine; having bromine in its composition.

bromic acid,

Chem.: $HBrO_3$. A monobasic acid, forming salts called bromates. When bromine is [illegible] potash a mixture of bromide and bromate of potassium is obtained, which can be separated by crystallization: $3Br_2 + 6KHO = 5KBr + KBrO_3 + 3H_2O$. Bromic acid can be prepared by passing chlorine into bromine water: $5Cl_2 + 6H_2O + 2HBrO_3 + 10HCl$. The acid is also formed by decomposing potassium bromate by nitric acid acting on baryta bromate by bromine, $Ba(BrO_3)_2 + Br_2 + H_2O = 2AgBr + 6HBrO_3$. It is a strongly acid liquid, reddening then bleaching litmus paper. On heating it does it decomposes into bromine and oxygen. It is decomposed by sulphur dioxide (sulphurous), sulphide of hydrogen (H_2S), and hydriodic acid (HBr). Bromates are [illegible] soluble in water, and are [illegible] heating into oxygen and bromides.

bromic silver,

Min.: The same as Bromyrite and Bromargyrite (q.v.).

brō-mīde, s. [Eng. brom(ine); -ide (Chem.) (q.v.).]

Chem.: A combination of bromine with a metal or a radical. Bromides are soluble in water, except silver and mercurous bromides; lead bromide is very slightly soluble. They are detected in analysis by the following reactions:—Argentic nitrate gives a yellowish precipitate of AgBr, insoluble in dilute nitric acid, and soluble in strong ammonia. Chlorine liberates bromine, and, if the liquid is shaken up with ether, a yellow ethereal solution floats on the liquid. Heated with sulphuric acid and MnO_2, bromides yield vapours of Br, which turns starch yellow.

* Bromide of silver, bromid of silver:

Min.: The same as Bromyrite (q.v.).

brō min-ā tēd, a. [Eng. bromin(e); -ated.] Combined with bromine (q.v.).

"Water and its chlorinated and brominated congeners."—Pharmac. Chem. (ed 1879), p. 944.

brō mine, s. [From Gr. βρωμος (bromos) = a stench; Mod. Lat. bromium.]

1. Chem.: An elementary metallic element. Symbol Br; atomic weight, 80. Bromine was discovered in 1826 by Balard in the salts obtained by the evaporation of sea-water. Bromine is liberated from the sodium and magnesium salts by the action of free chlorine, and is separated by ether, which dissolves the bromine. The red-coloured solution is removed, saturated with potash, evaporated, and heated to redness, and the bromide of potassium is heated with manganese dioxide and sulphuric acid. The bromine is liberated in the form of a deep red vapour, which condenses into a dark, reddish-black liquid. Sp. gr., 2·97; it boils at 63°; its vapour density is 5·54 times that of air. It has an irritating smell, and when inhaled is poisonous. It dissolves in thirty parts of water, and the solution has weak bleaching properties. Bromine and hydrogen do not unite in the sunlight, but do when they are passed through a red hot porcelain tube, forming hydrobromic acid (HBr), which is also obtained by the action of phosphorus and water on bromine. It is a colourless, fuming gas, which liquefies at 73°, very soluble in water. The concentrated solution contains 47·8 per cent. of HBr, it boils at 126°, and has powerful acid properties: it neutralises bases, forming bromides and water. Hypobromous acid, HBrO, is only known in solutions; it has bleaching properties. Bromine can displace chlorine from its compounds with oxygen, whilst chlorine can liberate bromine from its compound with hydrogen. Free bromine turns starch yellow.

2. Pharm.: Bromine has been applied externally as a caustic, but rarely. Its chief officinal preparations are bromide of ammonium, useful in whooping-cough, infantile convulsions, and nervous diseases generally; and bromide of potassium, now very extensively used, especially in epilepsy, hysteria, delirium tremens, diseases of the throat and larynx, bronchocele (Goitre), enlarged spleen, hypertrophy of liver, fibroid tumours, &c. Also, as an antaphrodisiac, for sleeplessness, glandular swellings, and skin diseases. Its alterative powers are similar to but less than that of the iodides. Its preparation is the same as iodide of potassium, substituting an equivalent quantity of bromine for iodine: $6KHO + Br_6 = 5KBr + KBrO_3 + 3H_2O$. It has a pungent saline taste, no colour, and occurs in colourless cubic crystals, closely resembling the iodide. As a hypnotic its usefulness is much increased by combining it with morphia and chloral hydrate.

* Bromingham groat: Counterfeit money.

"In other places whole lines are [only] transferred and perhaps parts of lines omitted into spurious Bromingham exports as counterfeit medals were called in those days."—Beaten Addition and Achitophel, pt. ii. (Note.)

brō mīte, s. [In Ger. bromit; Eng., &c. brom(ine), and -ite (Min.) (q.v.).] The same as Bromyrite and Bromargyrite (q.v.).

brōm līte, s. [From Bromley Hill, near Alston, in Cumberland, where it occurs; suff. -ite (Min.) (q.v.).]

Min.: An orthorhombic, translucent mineral, with hardness 4—4·5, sp. gr. 5·71—5·72, lustre vitreous. It is colourless, snow white, greyish, pale cream-coloured, or pink. Composition: Carbonate of baryta, 60·61—65·71; carbonate of lime, 30·19—34·29; carbonate of strontia, 0—6·64; and carbonate of manganese 0—9·18. It is found near Hexham, in Northumberland, and in Cumberland (etym.). It is called also Alstonite (q.v.).

brō-mō-ar-gȳn-tō-tȳpe, s. [Eng. bromo- from bromine (q.v.); Lat. argentum, and Gr. τυπος (tupos) = type.]

Photog.: A photographic agent of very delicate action made by nitrate of silver, bromide of potassium, and again nitrate of silver, brushed over paper.

brō-mō-fōrm, s. [From Eng., &c., brom(ine), and form(ate), from Lat. formica = an ant.]

Chem.: Bromoform $CHBr_3$, or Tribromomethane. It is a heavy volatile liquid, obtained by adding bromine to a solution of caustic potash in ethyl alcohol. It boils at 152°. Heated with caustic potash, it is converted into potassium bromide and potassium formate.

brō-mō-qui-nōne, s. [Eng., &c., bromine, and quinone.] [BROMANIL.]

 brōm ȳ-rēt, s. [BROMIDE.]

brō-mūs, s. [In Fr. brome; Sp., Port., & Ital. bromo; Lat. bromus; Gr. βρωμος (bromos) = a kind of oat, oberna sativa.]

Bot.: Brome-grass. A genus of grasses having two unequal glumes and two herbaceous glumelles, the outer one bifid and with an awn from below the extremity. Bromus mollis, or Soft Brome-grass, is widely diffused in Britain and abundant. Its seeds, when eaten by man or the larger animals, produce giddiness, and they are said to be fatal to poultry. B. secalinus, or Smooth-rye Brome-grass, is common in rye and wheat fields. When the seeds are accidentally ground with the flour, they impart a bitter taste to bread, and are narcotic like the seeds of Lolium temulentum. The panicles are said to be green. B. asper, or Hairy Wood-brome grass, is the tallest of British grasses; it is found in moist woods and hedges. B. sterilis, or Barren Brome-grass, is common, and some other species are not very rare.

brōm-ȳr īte, s. [From Fr. bromure d'argent bromuret of silver, i.e., a combination of bromine and silver.]

Min.: An isometric yellow, amber, or green splendent mineral, with a hardness of 2—3 and sp. gr. of 5—5·8, consisting of bromine 4—2·6, and silver 5—7·4, from Mexico and Chili. It is the same as bromargyrite, bromic silver, or bromide of silver (q.v.).

bronche, s. [BRANCH.]

brŏn chi, s. pl. [Latinised word, from Gr. βρογχια (bronghia) = the bronchial tubes.]

Anatomy:

1. Gen.: Any of the air-passages, great or small, in the lungs.

"Thus a bronchus of the size of a straw . . ."—Dr. C. J. B. Williams, in Cyc. P. M., art. Bronchia.

2. Spec.: The two great tubes into which the trachea divides beneath, just before entering the lungs.

brŏn chi-a,  brŏn chi-æ, s. pl. [In Fr. les bras. Mod. Lat. bronchiæ. From Gr. βρογχια (bronghia), the bronchial tubes; βρογχος (bronghos), the trachea, the windpipe. Akin to βρογχος (bronghos) = a fin, pl. the gills of fishes.]

Anat.: The bronchial tubes, the numerous ramifications into which the two bronchi divide within the lungs.

brŏn chi al, a. [From Gr. βρογχια (bronghia) The bronchia (q.v.).]

Med.: Belonging to the bronchus, or to the bronchia (q.v.).

Bronchial respiration of Andral and Laennec: A whistling sound, sometimes rising nearly to a whistle, which is heard in the respiration of a certain stage of pneumonia. It resembles the sound produced by blowing through a tow-spill. (Dr. C. J. B. Williams, Cyc. P. M., art. Pneumonia.)

Bronchial tubes: The same as the bronchia (q.v.).

brŏn chic,  brŏn chick, a. [From Gr. βρογχος (bronghos) the windpipe and Eng. suffix -ic.] Bronchial; pertaining to the bronchi.

brŏn-chi ĕc-tą-sis, s. [From Gr. βρογχος (bronchos) = the windpipe, and ἔκτασις (ektasis) = extension; ἐκτείνω (ekteinō) = to extend; ἐκ (ek) = out, and τείνω (teinō) = to stretch.]

Med.: Dilatation of the bronchi. [Bronchus.] The most important forms are:—(1) The general or uniform, with cylindrical or fusiform dilatation of a tube, or several tubes; (2) The saccular, or cimpullary [Ampulla], in which there is abrupt dilatation of a tube at a particular point or points. The breath and sputum are fetid, and general health impaired, followed by lung consolidation, ulceration, abscess, or gangrene. Death may result from exhaustion, but recovery may take place by formation of a sort of fibrous capsule, or from penetration of the pleura and thoracic walls and discharge of the contents outwards. Bronchiectasis is not uncommon, and is of interest and importance on account of its alliance with some forms of phthisis.

brŏn-chi tis, s. [Gr. βρογχια (bronchia) = the bronchia, or βρογχος (bronchos) = the bronchus or windpipe (q.v.), and Gr. -ιτις (itis) (Med.), denoting inflammation.]

Med.: Inflammation of the air-tubes leading to the pulmonary vesicles, accompanied by hoarseness, cough, increase of temperature, and soreness of the chest anteriorly. The natural mucous secretion is at first arrested, but increases afterwards, and is altered in quality, becoming more corpuscular. Its forms are:—(1) Acute bronchitis, (a) of the larger and medium-sized tubes; (b) capillary bronchitis, and bronchitis of the tubes generally the peri-pneumonia notha of the older writers. (2) Chronic bronchitis. (3) Plastic bronchitis. (4) Mechanical bronchitis, such as knife-grinder's disease—carbonaceous bronchitis or black phthisis. (5) Bronchitis secondary to general diseases, such as measles or typhoid fever. (6) Bronchitis secondary to blood diseases. (7) Syphilitic bronchitis. All varieties are generally preceded by feverishness, but oftener by "a cold in the chest." The uneasy sensations begin about the region of the frontal sinuses, passing from the nasal mucous passages, trachea, and windpipe to the chest, with hoarseness, cough, and expectoration; but in capillary bronchitis the cough is dry and without expectoration. In acute cases the sputum is first thin, then opaque and tenacious, lastly purulent, the breathing is hurried and laborious, the pulse quickened, and the skin dry. The danger increases in proportion as the finer bronchial tubes become involved, and instead of the healthy respiratory sound we have sharp, chirping, whistling notes, varying from sonorous to sibilant. The sharp sound is most to be feared, as arising in the smaller tubes; the grave, sonorous notes originate in the larger tubes. Spitting of blood sometimes occurs, and in severe cases persons actually die suffocated from the immense quantity of mucus thrown out obstructing the tubes and causing collapse of the vesicular structure of the lungs. The ratio of the respiration to the pulse is high, going up to 60 or even 70 in the minute, with a pulse-rate of 120 or 130. Chronic bronchitis, or bronchial catarrh, is extensively prevalent, especially among the aged, recurring once or twice a year in spring or autumn, or both, till it becomes more or less constant all the year round.

1. Archæol.: The age of bronze, the second of three ages believed by MM. Nilsson, Steenstrup, Forchhammer, Thomsen, Worsaæ, and other Danish archæologists to have followed each other in the peninsula of Jutland and elsewhere in the following order:—(1) The stone age. (2) the bronze age, and (3) the iron age. During the first stage, or sometimes bone, was used for weapons and implements, the working of metal being as yet unknown. Then weapons were made of bronze, the method of alloying the two metals having been discovered, but that of working in iron being undiscovered. Finally iron took the place of bronze. These views have been generally adopted by geologists and archæologists, though some believe an age of copper to have intervened between those of stone and bronze. The allegation that the use of stone came first, that of bronze next, and that of iron last is not inconsistent with the fact that all still exist contemporaneously in portions of the world.

During the age of bronze the oak was the dominant tree in Denmark, the Scotch-fir, now extinct in that country, having flourished during the earlier part of the stone age; while the beech was and remains the characteristic tree of the iron age. Lake-dwellings of the bronze period have been found in western and central Switzerland, and one has been discovered in the lake of Constance. Geologically even the stone age belongs only to the recent period. (Lubbock, Lyell, &c.)

2. Fig.: The Age of Bronze: The unheroic age of impudence, the age wanting in veneration for what is good and great, the grovelling age.

brówn'-ie, brówn'-ý, * broun -ý, s. [From Eng. brown, and suff. -y, as opp. to fair; -y.]

Scotch Mythology:

1. In Shetland: An imaginary being, to whom evil properties were attributed.

"Not above 40 or 50 years ago, almost every family had a Brounie or evil spirit so called, which served them to whom they gave a sacrifice for his service."
Brand: Descrip. Zetland, p. 112. (Jamieson.)

* 2. In other parts of Scotland: A domestic spirit or goblin, meagre, shaggy, and wild, till lately supposed to haunt many old houses, especially those attached to farms. He was the Robin Goodfellow of Scotland. In the night he helped the family, and particularly the servants, by doing many pieces of drudgery. If offered food or any other recompense for his services, he decamped and was seen no more. The diffusion of knowledge has been more potent in its operation, and the "brownie" may now be reckoned almost an extinct species. [BAWBY-BROWN.]

"All is but gaiatis, and stricke fantasyis, Of brownyis and of bogillis full this buke."
Doug. Virgil, 158, 26.

brówn'-ism, s. [From Robert Brown [1. Ch. Hist.], and Eng., &c. suffix -ism.]

1. Ch. Hist: The scheme of church government formed by Robert Brown about A.D. 1581. He considered that each congregation of Christians should be self-governing, and should be exempt from the jurisdiction of Bishops or of Synods. He was in favour of the election by each congregation of a pastor, but allowed others than him to preach and exhort. Propagating these views in England he met with so much opposition that he removed to Holland, but ultimately he returned to England and conformed to the Established Church. His views, slightly modified by Robinson, are those of the Independents or Congregationalists. [CONGREGATIONALISM.]

"That schism would be the surest schism to you; that would be Brownisme and Anabaptism indeed."—Milton: Reason of Ch. Gov., B. i.

2. Med.: The views of John Brown, founder of the medical system called after him Brunonism (q.v.).

brówn'-ist, s. [From Robert Brown [BROWNISM], and Eng., &c. suffix -ist.]

Bot.: A genus of plants belonging to the order Xanthoxylaceæ (Xanthoxyls). The green parts of Brucea sumatrana are intensely bitter. B. antidysenterica contains a poisonous principle called Brucia (q.v.). The bark of another species is bitter, and has qualities like those of Quassia Simaruba. B. ferruginea is from Abyssinia, and with B. sumatrana, already mentioned, has been introduced into British hot-houses.

* bruche (1), s. [BROCHE, BROOCH.] (Morte Arthure, 3,256.)

* bruche (2), s. [BREACH.]

brû'-chûs, s. [From Lat. bruchus; Gr. βρούχος (brouchos) or βρούχος (bruchos) = a wingless locust, which the modern bruchus is not.]

Entom.: A genus of beetles belonging to the section Tetramera, and the family Rhyncophora or Curculionidæ. The antennæ are fourteen-jointed, and are filiform, serrate, or pectinated, not geniculated as in the more normal Curculionidæ. It contains small beetles which deposit their larvæ in the germs of leguminous plants, and when hatched devour their seed. Bruchus Pisi is destructive to the garden-pea, but is not common in Britain. Several other species, as B. Lotti, B. Lathyri, &c., also occur in that country.

brû'-ṣine, brû'-ṣi-ṇ, s. [In Ger. brucin. Named from the plant Brucea antidysenterica, from which it is derived.]

Chem.: ($C_{23}H_{26}N_2O_4$). An alkaloid found along with strychnine in nux vomica, also in false Angustura bark. Brucine is a tertiary base; it is more soluble in alcohol and water than strychnine, and is less bitter and less poisonous. It forms crystalline salts, and turns a bright red colour when moistened with nitric acid.

Brû'-ṣite, s. [In Ger. brucit. Named after Dr. Bruce of New York, editor of the New American Mineralogical Journal.]

Mineralogy:

1. A rhombohedral translucent or subtranslucent sectile mineral, with broad, often tubular crystals, foliated, massive, or fibrous, with the fibres elastic. Hardness, 2·5; sp. gr., 2·35—2·46. Lustre between waxy and vitreous, but on a cleavage face pearly, and on the fibrous variety silky; colours white, greyish, bluish, or greenish. Compos.: Magnesia, 62·89—70; oxide of iron, 0—5·63; water, 29·48—31·43, &c. Found at Sunaness in Unst, the most northern of the Shetland Isles, in Sweden, in the Ural Mountains, and in North America. Variety 1, foliated; var. 2 (Nemalite), fibrous. (Dana.)

•1. Gen.: The name given in the West Indies to any one who cured flesh or fish in the way described in the etymology. This was done continually by the men described under 2.

2. Spec.: An order of men, not quite pirates, yet with decidedly piratical tendencies, who, for nearly two hundred years, infested the Spanish main and the adjacent regions. A bull of Pope Alexander VI., issued in 1493, having granted to Spain all lands which might be discovered west of the Azores, the Spaniards thought that they possessed a monopoly of all countries in the New World, and that they had a right to seize, and even put to death, all interlopers into their wide domain. Enterprising mariners belonging to other nations, and especially those of England and France, naturally looked at the case from quite an opposite point of view, and considered themselves at liberty to push their fortunes within the prohibited regions. Being cruelly treated, when taken, by the Spaniards, their comrades made reprisals, and a state of war was established between the Spanish governments in the New World and the adventurers from the old, which continued even when the nations from which they were drawn were at peace in Europe. The association of buccaneers began ...24, and continued till after the Revolution of 1688, when the French attacked the English in the West Indies, and the buccaneers of the two countries, who had hitherto been friends, took different sides, and were separated for ever. Thus weakened, they began to be suppressed between 1697 and 1701, and soon afterwards ceased to exist, pirates of the normal type to a certain extent taking their place. The buccaneers were also called "filibusters," or "flibustiers"—a term which was revived about the middle of the nineteenth century in connection with the adventures of "General" Walker in Spanish America. [FILIBUSTER.]

To be forsaken?"
Brown: Brit. Past., ii., p. 109.

bŭck'-thorn, s. [Eng. buck, and thorn.]

Ord. Lang. & Bot.: The English name of Rhamnus, a genus of plants, the typical one of the order Rhamnaceæ (Rhamnads). Two species—the common Buckthorn (Rhamnus catharticus) and the Alder Buckthorn (R. frangula)—occur in Britain. The former has dioecious flowers, sharply serrate ovate leaves, and terminal spines; the latter has hermaphrodite flowers, obovate entire leaves, and is unarmed. The berries of the common species are black, nauseous, and, as the name imports, highly cathartic; they afford a yellow dye when unripe, as the bark of the shrub does a green one. They are sold as "French berries." The alder buckthorn, again, has dark purple purgative berries, which, in an unripe state, dye wool green and yellow, and when ripe bluish grey, blue, and green. The bark dyes yellow, and, with iron, black. Of the foreign species, the berries of the Rock-buck thorn, or Rhamnus saxatilis, are used to dye the Marroquin or Morocco-leather yellow, whilst the leaves of the Tea-buckthorn, R. Theezans, are used by poor people in China as a substitute for tea. [RHAMNUS.]

Cowper: Tirocinium.

II. Technically:

1. Bot. (A Bud or Leaf-bud): The germ of future leaves which arises from a node immediately above the base of a leaf, or, in other words, from the axil of a leaf. Any one appearing in a different situation is regarded as latent or adventitious. A bud consists of scales imbricated over each other, the outer ones being the hardest and thickest, as being designed to afford protection to those within against the weather. In the centre of the scales is a minute but all-important cellular axis, or growing point, whence the future development is to take place.

Buds are distinguished into stem-buds (pleumules), leaf-buds, and flower-buds."—Thomé Structural & Physiol. Bot. transl. by Bennett, 3rd ed., 1875, p. 92

2. Zool.: A protuberance, or gemmule, on polypes and similar animals, which ultimately develops into a complete animal.

bŭffs, s. pl. [BUFF (2), s, II. 3.]

bŭf-fў, a. [From buff, s. & a. (q.v.).]

Med.: Of a buff colour; consisting of what is medically called buff (q.v.).

buffy-coat, s. A layer of fibrine at the top of the coagulum, formed on blood drawn from the veins of a patient during severe inflammation, and especially during pleurisy. The term buffy is applied to it because the red corpuscles being of heavier specific gravity fall to the bottom, leaving the lighter-coloured on the top. The buffy-coat varies from less than one line to one or two inches in thickness. It is called also buff and size.

bū-fo, s. [Lat. bufo = a toad.]

Zool.: A genus of Batrachians, the type of the family Bufonidæ (q.v.). The body is inflated, the skin warty, the hind feet of moderate length, the jaws without teeth, the nose rounded. There are numerous species widely distributed throughout the world, some of them being very common in the United States. They are among the most harmless of animals, while useful as insect destroyers. [TOAD.]

bū fo-nī-a, s. [BUFFONIA.]

bū fōn'-ĭ dæ, * pl. [From Lat. bufo = a toad, and fem. pl. suffix -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of Batrachians. They are distinguished from the Pipidæ by their possessing a well-developed tongue, and from the Ranidæ (Frogs) by the absence of teeth.

bū-fōn-ite, s. [Lat. bufo = a toad.] Literally toad-stone: a name given to the fossil teeth and palatal bones of fishes belonging to the family of Pycnodonts (thick teeth), whose remains occur abundantly in the oolitic and chalk formations. The term bufonite, like those of "serpent's eyes," "batrachites," and "crapaudines," by which they are also known, refers to the vulgar notion that those organisms were originally formed in the heads of serpents, frogs, and toads.

"If we consider the bulb or ball of the eye."—Ray

II. Technically:

1. Botany: A scaly body, formed at or beneath the surface of the ground, sending roots downward from its lower part and a stem upwards from its centre. It propagates itself by developing new bulbs in the axils of the scales of which it is formed. There are two kinds of bulbs: (1) a tunicated bulb, literally a coated bulb, that is, a bulb furnished with a tunic or covering of scales, the outer series of which is thin and membranous, example, the onion; and (2) a naked bulb, or one in which the outer scales are not membranous and united, but distinct and fleshy like the inner ones, example, the lilies. The so-called solid bulb of the crocus is, properly speaking, not a bulb at all, but an underground stem with buds upon it, technically called a corm (Corm), whereas a proper bulb is analogous not to an underground stem but to a bud only.

1/0 LBS (REDUCED)

1. Tunicated bulb, Hyacinth. 2. Section of ditto. 3. Scaly bulb, Lily (L. canadense). 4. Section of ditto.

2. Hort.: Bulbs placed in water tend to rot; they flourish best when fixed in very light soil or even in the air an inch above water, into which their roots enter. They should have abundance of light.

b. As adjective: [Bulb-tuber.]

bulb-tuber, bulbo-tuber, s. A corm.

bŭlb, v.i. [From bulb, s. (q.v.).] To take or possess the form of a bulb.

Bŭr-gŭn-dī-ăn, a. & s. [From Eng. Burgundy, and suff. -an. In Fr. Bourguignon.] [Burgundy.]

A. As adjective: Pertaining or relating to Burgundy.

B. As substantive: A native of Burgundy.

Bŭr-gŭn-dў, s. & a. [In Sw. bourgogne; Ger. burgunder = a kind of wine (def. 2). In Sw., Dan., & Ger. Burgund, Dut. Bourgogne, Fr. Bourgogne = a country (def. 1).]

A. As substantive:

1. Geog. (Burgundy): An old province of France, inhabited originally by a Gothic people, who invaded and settled in it in Roman times. The capital was Dijon. It now forms the Departments of Côte-d'Or, Saône-et-Loire, Ain, and part of Yonne.

2. Ord. Lang. (burgundy): The finest of the French wines, the produce of vines cultivated in the Côte-d'Or, a portion of the ancient province of Burgundy. The most noted of the red wines of Burgundy are Beaune, Chambertin. The white wines are less celebrated.

B. As adjective: Pertaining to or brought from the place indicated under A. 1.

1. Bot., Chem., & Comm.: Pix Burgundica: the resinous exudation of the stem of the Spruce-fir, Abies excelsa or Pinus Abies, melted and strained. It is got from Switzerland, but seldom genuine. It is hard and opaque, of a dull reddish-brown colour, aromatic odour, and aromatic taste. It gives off no water when heated, is not bitter, and is free from vesicles. It consists chiefly of resin and a little volatile oil, whence its odour. The resin resembles that of turpentine, and of the American frankincense.

2. Pharm.: Offic. prep., Emplastrum picis burgundicæ: a pitch-plaster. It acts externally as a slight stimulant to the skin. It enters also into the composition of the iron-plaster.

From Fin. Lapp. = As byrgian, byrian, buriare = to bury.] [Bury, v.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language

*1. Originally. (Of the forms buriels, buryels, biriel, burial). A tomb; a burying-place.

"... that hidden sepulcris of profetes and maken bare the beriels of lust men. Wycliffe: (Purvey's) Matt. xxiii. 29.

2. Now (Of the form burial): The act of burying, the state of being buried, interment, sepulture.

(1) Gen.: In the foregoing sense.

"... the duke take order for his burial."
Shakesp.: Richard III., i. 4.

(2) Spec.: The act of placing anything under earth or water.

"We have great lakes, both salt and fresh; we use them for burials of some natural bodies, for we find a difference of things buried in earth, and things buried in water."—Bacon.

II. Technically:

1. Archæol. & Hist.: Most nations have selected burial as the best method to dispose of their dead; the practice of burning them on a funeral pile, prevalent to a limited extent among the Greeks and the Romans and nearly universal among the Hindoos, being the exception and not the rule. About 1860 (?) B.C. Abraham buried Sarah. The Egyptians, and, at least, in some special cases, the Jews, embalmed their dead (Gen. l. 3, 26; John xix. 39, 40). [EMBALMMENT.] In Europe, according to Sir John Lubbock, interments in which the corpse is in a sitting or contracted posture belong to the stone age, those in which it has been burnt and only the ashes interred to the bronze age, and those in which the corpse lies extended presumably to the age of iron. During the first French Revolution a proposal was made to adopt the process of cremation, but it failed. The project was revived on the continent during this century, and has of late years been strongly advocated in the United States. Crematories have been built in several of our large cities, and many bodies reduced to ashes, with the result of some growth of the custom in public favor. As yet, however, the weight of public opinion strongly favors the old method of burial, and this innovation can make its way but slowly.

2. Law: In 1693, 1733, and 1783 Acts were passed imposing a tax on burials, but it has been long since repealed. A felo de se or suicide was formerly buried in the highway with a stake driven through his body, and all his goods and chattels were forfeited to the king. (Blackstone, bk. iv., ch. 14.) [BURIAL-GROUND, BURIAL-SERVICE.]

B. As adjective: (See the compounds.)

* Obvious compound: Burial-plain.

burial-aisle, s. An aisle in which a body has been interred. (Lit. & fig.)

"Looks he also wistfully into the long burial-aisle of the Past."—Carlyle: Sartor Resartus, bk. i., ch. xi.

burial board, s. A board of persons appointed to regulate burials.

burial-case, s. A mummy-shaped form of coffin, alleged to be an improvement on the ordinary one in the lids, in having glass over the face, in the means of fastening, in hermetical sealing, and in the complete isolation of the body from air by enveloping the corpse in a resinous or other air-excluding compound.

I. Ord. Lang.: Ground set apart or used for the interment of the dead.

1. Literally:

"Their mortal shadows intercept the sight Of the broad burial-ground outstretched below."
Scott: Don Roderick.

2. Figuratively:

"... we at the time exclaimed that it was the burial-ground of all the goats in the island."—Darwin: Voyage round the World (ed. 1870), ch. viii., p. 168.

II. Law:

1. In England: Burial-grounds are almost universally situated around churches, urban as well as rural. They are consecrated by bishops, and till recently no one could officiate at the funeral except the clergyman of the parish or another one appointed by him. On his part he was bound, without delay, to bury any corpse brought to the church or churchyard in the manner and form prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer.

2. In America: In the United States each city has its large public cemeteries, in which there is no restriction other than burial, or to character of service. Many societies and some religious denominations have their special cemeteries.

3. In Scotland: The Scottish parochial burying-grounds have long been open to all denominations, the conductors of a funeral having the right to request whom they please to officiate.

4. In Ireland: Some years previous to the disestablishment of the Irish Church the burial-grounds were similarly thrown open to all denominations.

burial-place, s. A place for burying the dead.

¶ A more general word than burying-ground. When one is interred in a church or committed to the deep the church or the ocean-bed is to him a burial-place, but it is not the burial-ground in which he sleeps. The Romans interred their dead outside the cities; the early Christians imitating them in this respect. Then the latter began to bury around their churches. Haydn makes the first Christian burial-place be instituted in 590, burial in cities in 742, in consecrated places in 750, and in churchyards in 758. Of late, cemeteries, with a consecrated portion for Church of England interments and an unconsecrated one for those of Dissenters, have been opened, Kensal Green in 1832 being the first. Sanitary considerations have led to a gradually increasing number of these places of interment being located outside of cities.

"At rest on the tombs of the knightly race,
The silent throngs of that burial-place."
Hemans: The Lady of Provence.

1. Ecclesiol.: What is called in the Liturgy "The Order for the Burial of the Dead."

2. Law: This "office," the Liturgy intimates, "is not to be used for any that die unbaptized, or excommunicate, or have laid violent hands upon themselves." Till 1880 the clergyman had to read it over all others to whom burial in the parish churchyard was accorded, but by the "Burials Laws Amendment Act" of that year a certain measure of discretion was given him. The same act opened the parochial grounds to any one who had previous rights of interment there without the limitations that an ordained clergyman must officiate, and the burial service must be used. Any person professing to be a Christian can officiate at the request of the relatives, provided proper notice be given to the incumbent. Latitude is given as to the service, but it must be performed in a decent and orderly manner, and without covert attack on Christianity. An ordained clergyman can also officiate now in unconsecrated ground without incurring any ecclesiastical penalty or censure.

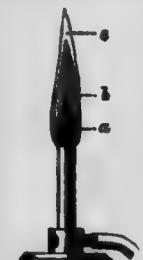
Chem.: A Bunsen's burner consists of a jet surmounted by a wide brass tube, at the bottom of which are several holes for the admission of air. The air and gas mix in the wide tube in such proportion that they burn with a non-luminous flame. The flame has the following structure. It consists of (1) a dark cone, consisting of cold unburnt coal-gas, mixed with 62 per cent. of air. (2) The flame-mantle b, composed of burning coal-gas mixed with air. (3) A luminous point c, seen only when the air-holes at the base of the lamp are partly closed; the area of this zone may be regulated by opening or shutting the holes to a greater or less extent. The flame of a Bunsen's burner is



BUNSEN'S BURNER.

(1) At a low temperature, is suitable for observing the flame colourations of volatile substances.

(2) At the highest temperature, is suitable for fusions at high temperatures.

¶ The lower oxidising flame is suitable for oxidation of substances in borax or other beads.

The lower reducing flame is suitable for reductions on charcoal, and for fusing borax or other beads in the reducing flame.

The upper oxidising flame (obtained by admitting the maximum of air) is suitable for oxidation at lower temperatures than are found at (2) (q.v.).

The upper reducing flame is suitable for reductions, and possesses greater reducing power than the lower reducing flame already mentioned.

1. Law:

(1) Maliciously to burn the sovereign's ships is a highly penal offence; so also is the setting fire to a house, barn, a haystack, &c. [Arson.] One can be fined even for setting fire to furze, heath, &c., in a forest, chase, or a common, or any similar place.

(2) Burning was once itself a penalty.

(a) Burning in the hand: [Branding, Benefit of Clergy.]

(b) Burning alive: Women were formerly burned alive for treason, as men were for the crime against nature, and under Edward I. for arson. It was also the punishment during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries for so-called heresy; the first person who thus suffered being Sir William Sawtre, priest of St. Osyth, London, 12th February, 1401. The cruel practice reached its consummation in Queen Mary's reign (1553-8), during three years of which 277 persons, most of them religious reformers, were consumed at the stake. (Blackstone: Comment., &c.)

2. Metal-working: Joining metals by melting their adjacent edges, or heating the adjacent edges and running into the intermediate space some molten metal of the same kind. It differs from soldering in this:—In burning a heat is required sufficient to melt the original metal, and a flux is seldom used. In soldering a lower heat is used and a more fusible metal employed, assisted by a flux. (Knight.)

3. Ceramics: The third heating of clay ware, which changes it from the dried or biscuited condition to the perfect ware. The glaze or enamel is applied to the baked ware, and is vitrified in the burning. (Knight.)

(1) Lit.: Of persons.

(2) Fig.: Of things.

"A frown upon the atmosphere
That hath no business to appear Where skies are blue, and earth is gay."
Byron: The Prisoner of Chillon, 2.

¶ (a) Crabb thus distinguishes between business, occupation, employment, engagement, and avocation: "Business occupies all a person's thoughts, as well as his time and powers; occupation and employment occupy only his time and strength: the first is mostly regular, it is the object of our choice; the second is casual, it depends on the will of another. Engagement is a partial employment, avocation a particular engagement: an engagement prevents us from doing anything else; an avocation calls off or prevents us from doing what we wish. . . . A person who is busy has much to attend to, and attends to it closely: a person who is occupied has a full share of business without any pressure; he is opposed to one who is idle: a person who is employed has the present moment filled up; he is not in a state of inaction: the person who is engaged is not at liberty to be otherwise employed: his time is not his own; he is opposed to one at leisure."

(b) Business, trade, profession, and art are thus discriminated: "These words are synonymous in the sense of a calling, for the purpose of a livelihood: business is general, trade and profession are particular: all trades are business, but all business is not trade. Buying and selling of merchandize is inseparable from trade; but the exercise of one's knowledge and experience, for purposes of gain, constitutes a business; when learning or particular skill is required, it is a profession; and when there is a peculiar exercise of art, it is an art: every shop-keeper and retail dealer carries on a trade, brokers, manufacturers, bankers, and others, carry on business, clergymen, medical, or military men follow a profession; musicians and painters follow an art."

(c) The following is the distinction between business, office, and duty: "Business is what one prescribes to one's self; office is prescribed by another; duty is prescribed or enjoined by a fixed rule of propriety; mercantile concerns are the business which a man takes upon himself; the management of parish concerns is an office imposed upon him often, much against his inclination; the maintenance of his family is a duty which his conscience enjoins upon him to perform. Business and duty are public or private; office is mostly of a public nature: a minister of state, by virtue of his office, has always public business to perform; but men in general have only private business to transact; a minister of religion has public duties to perform in his ministerial capacity; every other man has personal or relative duties, which he is called upon to discharge according to his station." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) business-like, a. Like business, with proper accuracy, with attention to details, and a careful adaptation of means to the end aimed at, such as is seen in men expert in business, and is one of the most important elements in their success.

"There is no need, however, that it should diminish that strict care and business-like application to the matter in hand, . . ."—J. S. Mill: Political Economy (1848), vol. i., bk. i., ch. vii., § 4, p. 125.

bŭs-tăm-ite, s. [Named after Mr. Bustamente, its discoverer, and suff. -ite (Min.) (q.v.).]

Min.: A variety of Rhodonite (q.v.). Dana makes it the equivalent of his calciferous Rhodonite. It is greyish-red in colour.

bŭs-tard, s. [In Fr. outarde; Provinc. & O. Fr. bistarde, bustarde, boustarde; Prov. austarde; sp. acutarda; Port. abetarda, betarda; Ital. ottarda; from Lat. avis tarda (Pliny) = slow bird.]

Ornith.: The name of a genus of birds, the Otis, which is the typical one of the family Otidæ. [OTIS, OTIDÆ.] Three species occur in Britain, the Great Bustard (O. tarda), the Little Bustard (O. tetrix), and Macqueen's Bustard (O. Macqueeni). The Great Bustard was formerly common in Wiltshire and in Norfolk, but being large, the male about four feet long and the female three, it was too conspicuous a bird to escape persecution, and now it is a rare visitor. It is one of the indigenous animals which Sir Chas. Lyell cites as having been recently extirpated or all but extirpated in England. (Prin. of Geol., ch. xlii.) It has the plumage on the back of a bright-yellow traversed by a number of black bars, the rest of the plumage being greyish. It runs and flies well. It is still common on parts of the Continent. The Little Bustard (O. tetrix) is a Mediterranean bird which occasionally straggles to Britain. It is brown dotted with black above, and beneath is whitish. The male has a black neck with two white collars.

" Thick-kneed bustard: One of the English names for a bird, the Common Thick-knee. (Œdicnemus Bellonii).

bŭs-tĭ-ŏŭs, *bus-ti-ous, a. [BUSTUOUS.]

bŭs-tine, s. [Of uncertain origin; perhaps from Eng. fustian, or from O. Fr. boutine = a fabric made at Montpelier.] A fabric, resembling fustian, of foreign manufacture.

"Neat, neat she was, in bustine waistcoat clean.
Ramsay: Poems, ii. 70.

bŭs-tle, *bŭs tĕl (t silent), bŭs le, *bŭs kle, bŭse kle, v.i. & t. [Bustle is probably from Icel. busla = to bustle, to splash about in the water; and busle from A.S. bysgian = to be busy. (Skeat, Mahn, &c.).]

A. I. Intransitive:

1. In a good sense: To be active.

"Come, bustle, bustle; caparison my horse."
Shakesp.: Rich. III., v. 3.

2. In a slightly bad sense: To move about in a bussy manner; to go hither and thither with agitation, and generally with unnecessary noise or stir.

"Wherefore now began the bishopes to bustle and " Expos. of Daniel, ii.
"Acting the world, and bustling to be great."
Granville.

"Of idle busy men the restless fry Run bustling to and fro with foolish haste
In search of pleasures vain that from them fly."
Thomson: Castle of Indolence, i. 69.

† B. Transitive: To cause to move about with unnecessary noise or stir; to jostle, to push about.

bŭs-tle (1) (t silent) (Eng.), bŭs-săe (Scotch), s. [From bustle, v. (q.v.).] In Icel. bustl = a bustle, the splashing about of a fish.] The act of hurrying about with much noise, generally to an unnecessary extent; stir, agitation, tumult.

"The bustle of the mariners,
In stillness or in storm."
Wordsworth: The Blind Highland Boy.

¶ Crabb thus distinguishes between bustle, tumult, and uproar:—"Bustle has most of hurry in it; tumult most of disorder and confusion; uproar most of noise: the hurried movements of one, or many, cause a bustle; disorderly struggles of many constitute a tumult; the loud elevation of many opposing voices produces an uproar. Bustle is frequently not the effect of design, but the natural consequence of many persons coming together; tumult commonly arises from a general effervescence in the minds of a multitude; uproar is the consequence either of general anger or mirth. A crowded street will always be in a bustle; contested elections are always [not even in the olden time 'always,' and now under the ballot rarely] accompanied with a great tumult; drinking parties make a considerable uproar, in the indulgence of their intemperate mirth." (Crabb: Eng Synon.) bŭs-tle (2) (t silent), s. [Etymology doubtful. Perhaps connected with bust (2), s.] A pad or cushion, formerly worn by ladies beneath their dress to expand their skirts behind, and relieve the wearer of part of their weight. It was called also a bishop.

† bŭs-tler (t silent), s. [Eng. bustle; -er.] One who bustles; an active, stirring man.

"Forgive him, then, thou bustler in concerns Of little worth, an idler in the best."
Cowper: Task, bk. vi.

bŭs-tling (t silent), bŭs-tăl-ĭng, pr. par., a., & s. [BUSTLE, v.]

bŭs-tō (pl. bustoes), s. [Ital. busto.] [BUST, s.] A bust (prose and poetry).

" . . . a vestibule supported with pillars, with some antick bustoes in the niches."—Addison, Berk iii. 11s.

"Worn on the edge of days, the brass consumes,
The busto no elders, and the deepest marble,
Untendly to the steel, gives up its charge."
R. Blair: The Grave.

bus-tu-ous, *bus-te-ous, *bus-ti-ous, *bous-tous, a. [BOISTEOUS.] Large in size; strong, powerful; terrible, fierce; rough, unpolished, boisterous, rude. (Dunbar: The Thrissel and the Rose, 5; Doug.: Virgil, 131,27; Lyndsay: Warkis (1592), p. 167.)

 bus-tu-ous-ness, s. [BOISTOUSNESS.] (Scotch.) (Jamieson.) (Doug. : Virg., 374,45.)

bus-ў, *bus-ie, *bus-i (us as iz), bou-y, * bes-i, * bis-y, * bis-i (Eng.), bus-ў, * bis-ey (Scotch), a. [A.S. bysig, bisig, bysi (Somner), Dut. bezig.] [BUSINESS.]

1. Of persons, or of the inferior animals: Occupied so that the attention is fixed on what is being done; occupied, with much work to be done.

(1) Occupied at the time to which attention is being directed.

"Gude ale keepe me bare and hizzy, Gaurs me tipple till I be dizzy Remains of Nithsdale Song, p. 90. (Jamieson.)

"Sir, my mistress sends you word
That she is busy and she cannot come."
Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, v. 2.

(2) Troublesome; vexatiously meddlesome.

"The Christians sometimes valiantly receiving the enemy, and sometimes charging them again repulsed the proud enemy, still busy with them."—Knolles: History of the Turks.

(3) Habitually occupied, with only necessary remission; bustling, active, industrious.

(a) In a good or in an indifferent sense Occupied.

" . . . or the controversy of opinions, wherein the busy world has been so much employed."—Temple.

(b) In a bad sense: Fussy, meddling.

"On meddling monkey, or on busy ape."
Shakesp.: Mid. Night's Dream, ii. 1.

2. Of things personified: At work temporarily or habitually. Used—

(1) Of the hands, feet, &c., or other material instruments of man's action.

"Display with busy and laborious hand
The blessings of the most indebted land."
Cowper: Expostulation.

(2) Of the powers or faculties of the human mind.

"This busy pow'r is working day and night."
Pierce.

(3) Of such abstract conceptions as rumour, scandal, science, culture.

"Rumours strange,
And of unholy nature, are abroad,
And busy with thy name."
Byron: Manfred, iii. 1.

¶ Compounds of obvious signification: Busy-looking (Pope), busy-minded.

bus-ў (us as iz),  bus-i-en, * bis-i-en (pret. busied), v.t. & i. [From busy, a. (q.v.). A.S. bysigan, bysgian.]

A. Trans.: To make or keep busy, to engage, to employ industriously or with unremitting attention.

"Lavers busied us of me"—E. Eng. Psalter. Ps. xxxix. 10.

¶ It is followed by with, in, about, amid, &c., or by an infinitive.

"Be it thy course to busy giddy minds With foreign quarrels."
Shakesp.: 2 Hen. IV., iv. 4.

" . . . busied with dice and claret, love letters and challenges."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

"The learning and disputes of the schools have been much busied about genus and species."—Locke.

¶ It is often used reflexively.

"For the rest, it must be owned he does not busy himself by entering deep into any party."—Swift.

† B. Intrans.: To be active, to be much engaged.

"Martha busyede aboute moche servyce."—Wick. Bo. Luke x. 40.

"Naf I now to busy but bare thre daves."
Sir Isaw and the Gr. Knight, 1,066.

bus-ў-bŏd-ў (us as iz), s. [Eng. busy; body.] A person at a certain period or habitually engaged with things with which he has no duty or no clear call to intermeddle. (Used of either sex.)

"And witha' they [the younger widows] learn to be idle, cadering about from house to house, and not only idle but tattlers also, and busibodies, speaking things which they ought not."—Tem., v. 13.

"William thought him a busybody who had been severely punished for running into danger without any call of duty."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxi.

bus-ў-ĭng (us as iz), pr. par. [BUSY, v.]

 bus y-ship, * bis i-schipe, * bes i-ship, s. [O. Eng. bisi, bes = Eng. busy, and suffix -ship.] Business, exercise.

"Loom the bisschipe is to lutel wurth."—Ancren Riwle, p. 394.

bŭt (1),  bŭtte, * bute, * bot, * bote, * buton, * boute, * buten, prep., conj., adv., & s. [A.S. butan, būton, būtun, būta, būte, as prep. = without, except; as conj. = unless, except, save, but (Bosworth), from A.S. be, Eng. bi = by, ūtan, ūte = without, beyond; O. Sax. hūtan, hūtun. (OUT.) In Dut. buiten = without, out, besides, except.]

A. As preposition:

¶ Technically it is one of separation or exclusion (Bain: Higher Eng. Gram.) Its signification is excepting.

1. Except, unless, besides, save.

" . . . and we have no objection but the obscurity of several passages by our ignorance in facts and persons."—Swift.

2. Without.

" 'Touch not the cat but a glove;' the motto of the Macintoshes. (Jamieson.)

B. As conjunction:

I. Ordinary Language:

¶ Technically it is a co-ordinate conjunction of the division called adversatives, and the subdivision arrestives, that is, it is a conjunction in which the second sentence or clause is in opposition to the one preceding it, and arrests an inference which that first sentence or clause would else have suggested. (Bain: Higher Eng. Gram.) Its significations are—

1. Properly or strictly:

(1) Yet still, notwithstanding which, contrary to what might have been expected.

¶ It expresses that the inference which would naturally be deduced from the first of the two clauses which it couples together can not legitimately be drawn, there being a disturbing element which destroys its validity.

"The words of his mouth were smoother than butter, but war was in his heart; his words were softer than oil, yet were they drawn swords."—Psalms, lv. 21.

† (2) Excepting that, except that, unless that, were it not that, had it not been that.

¶ Properly it is an ellipsis for but that.

"And, but my noble Moor
Is true of mind and made of no such baseness
As jealous creatures are, it were enough
To put him to ill thinking."
Shakesp.: Othello, iii. 4.

(3) Except, unless, otherwise than, other-wise than that.

"I should sin
To think but nobly of my grandmother."
Shakesp.: Tempest, i. 2.

"Who shall believe
But you misuse the reverence of your place?"
Ibid.: 2 Henry IV., iv. 2.

2. More loosely: Yet, still, however, added to which; as a complementary statement to which

¶ In this second sense it is used, though there is no disappointment of expectation with regard to the interpretation derivable from the first clause.

(1) Yet, still, however, nevertheless.

"... he [Naaman] was also a mighty man in valour: but he was a leper." —2 Kings, v. 1.

(2) Added to which, as a complementary statement to which

"By the blessing of the upright the city is exalted: but it is overthrown by the mouth of the wicked."—Prov. xi. 11.

¶ In the foregoing example there is an opposition between the words exalted and overthrown, and between upright and wicked, but the second clause, taken as a whole, is complementary and not antithetical to the first.

(3) Without this consequence following.

"Fir ots that constrain the ground,
Do seldom their usurping power withdraw;
But raging floods possess their hasty hand."
Drayton.

(4) Than.

"The full moon was no sooner up and shining in all its brightness, but he opened the gate of Paradise."—Guardian.

(5) Therefore, that, that, for anything otherwise than that.

"It is not therefore impossible but I may alter the completion of my plays."—Dryden.

"... many looking but he should have died."—Apollonius, i. 16. (Jamieson.)

(6) Provided that.

"But only to have the cryptovism."
Bust. of Brunno, 3,764.

II. Technically:

* ¶ Logic: The connecting word which introduced the minor term of a syllogism.

"God will one time or another make a difference between the good and the evil. But there is little or no difference made in this world, therefore there must be another world, wherein this difference shall be made.—Watts's Logick.

¶ The word but in such a case being useless, and even incorrect, is omitted by Whately and other modern logicians.

"All wits are dreaded, some who are admired are wits, therefore some who are admired are dreaded."—Whately's Logic, II., iii. § 5.

2. Math.: As assumed or formally proved.

"... therefore the side DB is greater than the side BC, but DB is equal to BA and AC."—Simson's Euclid, bk. i., prop. 20.

C. As adv.:

* 1. Without it.

"Whose wule mot been buten."—Ancren Riwle, p. 418.

2. Not more than, only.

"... there is but a step between me and death."—1 Sam. xx. 3.

D. As substantive:

1. The word but or the idea which it expresses

If they [a man's virtues] be like a clear light, eminent, they will stick him with a but of detraction."—Bacon's Apothegms, pt. i., ben. xi. (Richardson.)

2. A hindrance, an impediment. (Scotch.) (Jamieson.)

E. In special phrases and compounds:

1. But-and, but and, butand, but and, conj. [O. Eng. but, bot, ...] Besides

"Or I will beam yourself the rein,
But tool your tenders thro'."
Anderson's Gardeners, Perrey's Reliquiæ, i. 88.

2. But for: Without, had it not been for "Rash man ... bear but for some unbelief, My joy had been as fatal as my grief."—Waller.

3. But-if, bot if, but if, but gif, bute if: Unless, except.

"But gif he wold in ani wise ... him-self schewe formeost."—William of Palerne, 989.

"I cannot gif you t' at pre-eminence and place, but gif I knew a me excellent quille learning and vide lyfe in you mair than all the ancient Doctouris."—Kennedy of Colzean to Keith's Hist., App. p. 161. (Jamieson.)

4. But persuing: Without being seen.

"That set their soldiers to the wall,
And but persuing, com vyall."
Barbour: Bruce, xvii. 91-2.

5. But that, bote that, bute that, buten that, buton that: Unless, except.

"He wolde al his kinelond setten on lowe bond, buton that he kinges wurde king of [...] londe."—Layamon, iii. 161.

5. But yet: Yet, still, notwithstanding, stated more emphatically.

"But yet, Madam——
I do not like but yet, it does allay
The good precedence: fie upon but yet!
But yet is as a gaoler, to bring forth [illegible]" Shakesp.: Ant. & Cleop., ii. 5.

but-and, prep. [But, E (1).]

but-if, conj. [But, E (3).]

būt (2), bütt, prep., adv., & c. (From A.S. bútan, búton, bútun, (prep.) = without, except. From be = by, and útan = without, beyond.] (Scotch.)

A. As prep.: Towards the outer part of the house.

"Lifts up his head, and looking butt the floor."
Ross' Helenore first ed., p. 74.

"Plaught bred upon her but the house he spread."
Ibid., p. 76.

* but (2), v. impers. [Boot, v. impers.] (Scotch.) būt-al'-an-ine, s. [Eng., &c., but(yl); alanine.]

Chem.: Amidoisovaleric acid $C_4H_8(NH_2)O_2$, or $(H_3C)_2CH.CH(NH_2)OC(OH)$. It occurs in the pancreas of the ox. It can be formed by heating bromoisovaleric acid with ammonia. It crystallises in shining plates, which can be sublimed. It is soluble in alcohol and in water.

bū-tane, s. [From Eng., &c., butyl; suff. -ane.]

Chem.: A compound, also called Tetrane, C_4H_{10}. It exists in two modifications: (1) Normal Butane, $CH_3.CH_2.CH_2.CH_3$ or Diethyl, a paraffin hydrocarbon occurring in petroleum, also obtained by heating ethyl iodide with zinc in sealed tubes to 100°. It is a colourless gas which may be condensed into a liquid boiling at 1°C. (2) Isobutane, $CH_3—CH\begin{cases}CH_3\\CH_3\end{cases}$ is obtained from tertiary butyl alcohol by converting it into tertiary butyl iodide and acting on that with nascent hydrogen. It is a gas which liquifies at 17°.

būtch'-ėr, * boch-ėr, * boch-ere, * bowch-ėr, * bouch'-ėr, s. & v. [Fr. boucher, Prov. bochier; Ital. beccaio, beccaro; Low Lat. bocherius = (1) a killer of goats (2) a butcher generally. From O. Fr. boc: Fr. bouc; Ital. becco = a goat, a buck.] [Buck (1), s.]

Sir Perceforest (ed. Herrtage), 3, 266, 26.

bŭte, s. [Boot (1), s. From bute, v.]

1. Remedy, help. (Rowlands and Ottwell (ed. Herrtage), 49/c.)

2. Boot.

"And gif it bote mair, it sall remane to bute and parting."—Balfour: Practicks, p. 664.

bute, prep. & conj. [But.]

bute if, conj. [But if.]

bū tē-ă, s. Named after John, Earl of Bute (1713-92), a munificent patron of botany.]

Bot.: A genus of papilionaceous plants, consisting of trees and scandent shrubs. Bute frondosa (Downy-leaved Butea) is a large tree called in India pullus, whence the name Plassy, the locality of the celebrated battle on June 23, 1757, which laid the foundation of the Indian empire. It has large axillar, and terminal racemes of deep-red downy flowers, which dye cotton cloth, previously imbued with a solution of alum, of a fine yellow colour. The tree is used also as a discutient to indolent tumours. The gum-lac of commerce comes from the same tree.

bŭte-ĭng, pr. par. & s. [Butt, v.]

A. As present participle: (See the verb.)

B. As verbal noun:

1. The act of dividing goods captured; the state of being so divided.

"[Ye] shall find that they sall have to the said prise and buteing of goods, . . ."—Balfour: Practicks, p. 664.

2. The goods divided.

"Of all pillage, the captaine, the master, &c., gettis no part but the ring, but it sall be equal to divide among the remanent of the company mariners that hath watch, and pangis to the ruder."—Balfour: Practicks, p. 664.

bŭte-lănge, s. [From O. Scotch bute = a butt, and lang = long, length.] The length or distance between one butt, used in archery, and another.

"As his maiestie wes wirking ten pair of butelangis to the townis of Perth, . . ."—Acts Ja. VI., 1594 (ed. 1814), p. 264.

"Thane butem nor long swing he drey."
Story of Gen. & Exod., 1558.

bū'-tēne, s. & a. [Eng. but(yric), s.; -ene, a termination used for hydrocarbons having the formula C_nH_{2n}.]

A. As substantive:

Chem.: An organic, diatomic, fatty radical, C_4H_8", called also Butylene, Quartene, and Tetrene. There are three modifications of it, having the formula C_4H_8. Normal Butene, $CH_3 \cdot CH_2 \cdot CH = CH_2$; Pseudo-butene, $CH_3 \cdot CH = CH \cdot CH_3$; Iso butene, $\begin{matrix} H_3C \\ H_3C \end{matrix} > C = CH_2$.

Normal-butene is produced by the action of alcoholic potash on primary-butyl-iodide ($CH_3 \cdot CH_2 \cdot CH_2 \cdot CH_2I$.), or by the action of zinc ethide $Zn(C_2H_5)_2$ on bromo-ethene (C^2 "HBr). It is a gas at ordinary temp., ; at 10° it is condensed into a liquid. P. . . ylene is formed by the action of alcoho. potash on a pseudo-butyl-iodide ($CH_3 \cdot CHI \cdot CH \cdot CH_3$). It boils at 3°. It can also be obtained by the decomposition of amyl alcohol at red heat.

Iso-butene is formed by the action of alcoholic potash and tertiary-butyl-iodide, or by the electrolysis of isovaleric acid. It boils at 6°. I., is absorbed by strong H_2SO_4; on diluting with water and distilling, tertiary-butyl-alcohol is obtained, $C(CH_3)_3OH$. The di-bromides of the three isomeric butenes, $C_4H_8Br_2$, boil—normal at 160°, iso at 150°, and pseudo at 140°.

B. As adjective: (See the compound.)

butene glycols, s. pl. Chemical compounds, $C_4H_8(OH)_2$, called also butylene alcohols and quartene alcohols. They are diatomic alcohols. Six are theoretically possible. The following have been examined:

1. Normal Butene Glycol: $CH_3-CH(OH)-CH_2-CH_2(OH)$. Formed by leaving a cold mixture of acetic aldehyde and dilute hydrochloric acid for a few days, when aldol, the aldehyde of butene glycol, is formed; this is treated with sodium amalgam. It is a thick liquid, boiling at 204°. By oxidating with chromic acid mixture it is converted, first into crotonic aldehyde, then into acetic and oxalic acids.

2. Ethyl Glycol: $CH_3-CH_2-CH(OH)-CH_2(OH)$, obtained from normal butene bromide by saponification with caustic potash. It is a viscid liquid, boiling at 182°. By rapid oxidation it is converted into oxalic acid, but by dilute nitric acid into glycollic and glyoxylic acids.

3. Isobutene Glycol: $\begin{matrix} H_3C \\ H_3C \end{matrix} > C(OH)-CH_2(OH)$, or dimethyl glycol. It is prepared by heating isobutene bromide for several days with potassium carbonate. It boils at 178°. Oxidised by potassium permanganate into carbonic and acetic acid.

bū-tĕ-ō, s. [Lat. buteo = a buzzard.]

Ornith.: A genus of raptorial birds, the typical one of the sub-family Buteoninæ. There are two British species, Buteo vulgaris, the Brown or Common Buzzard, and B. lagopus, the Rough-legged Buzzard. [Buzzard.]

bū-tĕ-ō-nī-næ, s. pl. [From Lat. buteo = a buzzard, and I. pl. suff. -inæ.]

Ornith.: A sub-family of Falconidæ, containing the Buzzards. It is placed near the Aquilinæ (Eagles), and has a remote affinity to the Vulturidæ (Vultures). [Buzzard.]

bu tē ō nine, a. [Buteoninæ.] Pertaining to, or resembling the Buzzards.

* 1. A cup-bearer.

"This butcher lowgh anne for-gat."
George & Dr., Kmt., 1,602.

"Butler (butelier, F.). . . . Pincerna, promus, propinator architriclus, Cath."—Prompt. Parv.

"And thou shalt deliver Pharaohs cup into his hand after the former manner when thou wast his butler."—Gen. xl. 14.

2. An officer who had charge of the wine for the royal tables, and certain duties connected with the import of wines. [Butlerage.]

3. The head male servant of a household, who has charge of the plate, wines, &c.

"This letter, notwithstanding the poor butler's manner of writing it."—Spectator.

bŭt'-lĕr-age (age as ĭj), s. [Eng. butler, and suff. -age.] An ancient hereditary duty belonging to the crown. It was the right of taking two tuns of wine from every ship importing twenty tuns or more into England. This right, which is mentioned in the great roll of the Exchequer in 8 Richard I., was commuted under Edward I. for a duty of two shillings on every tun imported by merchant strangers. The proceeds were given to the king's butler, whence the name butlerage. It was called also prisage of wines. (Blackstone: Comment., bk. i., ch. 8.)

"The ordinary finances are casual or uncertain, as be the escheats, the customs, butlerage, and impost."—Bacon.

bŭt'-lĕr-ship, bŭt'-tĕl-lĕr-shyppe, s. [Eng. butler, and suff. -ship.] The office of functions of a butler.

". . . and restored the chiefe butteler vnto his butelershippe."—Bible (1551), Gen. xl.

"And he restored the chief butler unto his butlership again, and he gave the cup into Pharaoh's hand."—Gen. xl. 21.

bŭt'-mĕnt, s. [Contr. from Eng. abutment (q.v.).

Architecture:

1. The buttress of an arch; the supporter, i.e., the part which joins it to the upright pier. [Abutment.]

2. The mass of stonework at the extremities of a bridge to give lateral support to its arches, or support to the ends of the beams if the bridge be a wooden one.

Carp.: The part of a mortised timber surrounding the mortise, and against which the shoulders of the tenon bear.

bū tō-mā'-çē-æ, s. pl. [From Mod. Lat. butomus (q.v.), and fem. pl. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Butomads, an order of plants placed by Dr. Lindley under his seventeenth or Alismal alliance. The sepals are three, generally herbaceous. The petals are three, coloured, and petaloid, being generally purple or yellow. The flowers are in umbels. There are three, six, or more ovaries distinct, or united into a single mass. The seeds are numerous and minute. The leaves, which are very cellular, have parallel veins, and often a milky juice. The species are found in marshes in Europe and in tropical America. In 184 Dr. Lindley estimated their number at seven, in four genera.

bū tŏm-ăd'-ăç, s. pl. [From Mod. Lat. butomus (q.v.), and Eng. pl. suff. -ads.]

Bot.: Lindley's name for the order Butomaceæ (q.v.).

bū'-tŏm-ŭs, s. [In Fr. butome; Sp. & Ital. butomo; Gr. βούτομος (boutomos): βοτόμον (boutomon): from βους (bous) = an ox, and τεμνω (temnō) = to cut. So called because the sharp leaves cut the mouths of oxen which feed upon them.]

Pat.: Flowering-rush, formerly called also Water-gladiole, or Grassy-rush. A genus of plants, the typical one of the order Butomaceæ. It has nine stamens, a very unusual number, and six capsules. Butomus umbellatus, or Common Flowering rush, is wild in ditches and ponds in England and Ireland. It is a highly ornamental plant, with the leaves, which are all radical, two or three feet long, and an umbel of many rose-coloured flowers.

butt (1), bitt, s. & a. [Fr. bout; O. Fr. but = an end.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ord. Lang.: The end, the furthest limit of anything.

II. Technically:

1. Tools, weapons, &c.:

(1) Gen.: The hinder, larger, or blunter end of an object; as of a gun, a connecting-rod, a crow bar, &c.

(2) Spur.: The shoulder-end of a gun-stock covered with a heel-plate.

2. Tanning, &c.:

(1) The thick part of an ox-hide.

(2) Pl. (butts): Those parts of the tanned hides of horses which are under the crupper. (Jamieson.)

B. As adjective: (See the compound.)

butt-end, s. [Butt-end.]

butt (2), s. In compos. [From butt (1), v. = to abut.] An abuttal.

¶ Butts and bounds: The abuttals and boundaries of land. (Halliwell.)

"But or butal or byastle (herself, P.) Mete."—Promp. Parv.

3. Joinery, &c.:

(1) The end of a connecting-rod against which the boxing is attached by the strap, cotter, and gib.

(2) The end of an object where it comes squarely against another.

(3) A joint where the ends of two objects come squarely together without scarfing or chamfering.

2. Shipbuilding: The meeting joint of two planks in a strake. The joint between two strakes is a seam.

3. Door-hinges: A form of door-hinge which screws to the edge of a door, and butts against the casing instead of extending along the face of a door, like the strap hinge. It consists of two oblong plates, one edge of each of which is dentated to fit its fellow, a pintle traversing each interlocking portion to form a joint. [Butt-hinge.]

4. Fire engines: The standing portion of a half-coupling at the end of a hose.

Saddlery: A short chain which reaches from the leather-tug to the single-tree, to each of which it is hooked.

butt-hinge, but-hinge, s. A hinge formed of two plates and interlocking projecting pieces which are connected by a pintle.

Carp.: A joint in which the pieces come square against each other, endwise. In iron-work the parts are welded, and the term is used in contradistinction to a lap-joint or weld.

butt-weld, s.

Forging: A weld in which the edges are square-butted and jammed against each other, and then welded, a jump-weld.

butt (3), s. & a. [From Fr. but = a butt, a mark, aim, a laughing-stock; butte = a hillock, a mark, a mound of earth, point, aim, goal, butt.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A place or person aimed at.

(1) Lit.: A place on which a mark is placed to be shot at, a target. [II., 1.]

¶ Often in the plural, referring to a line of marks to be aimed at rather than a single one.

"But chief, beside the butts, there stand Bold Robin Hood and all his band."
Scott: Lady of the Lake, v. 22

¶ A bull's length: The distance at which the butt is from the person aiming at it.

(2) Figuratively:

(a) A place which one aims at reaching.

"Here is my journey's end, here is my butt,
The very mercy-seat of my eternal hill."
Shakesp.: Othello, v. 2.

(b) A person or persons viewed as an object for angry attack, or for ridicule.

"The people were the most common-place, and the butt against whom all the arrows were directed."—Church: Bacon.

"Plunge then, at last, the butt to crush his jokes on."
Pope: Satires, i. 170.

2. Ground appropriated for practising archery. (Scotch.)

3. A piece of ground which in ploughing does not form a proper ridge, but is cultivated at an angle; a piece of land in any way disjoined from the rest. (Scotch.)

"And that other rig or butt of land of the same lyand in the flead called the Gallow-hauk, on the Gall of south end thereof."—Acc. Chas. II. (ed. 1816), viii. 230.

¶ Hence a small piece of land is sometimes called the butts. (Jamieson.)

II. Technically:

Rifle and Artillery Practice:

1. A target.

2. A wooden structure, consisting of several thicknesses of boards, separated by small intervals, for the purpose of ascertaining the depth of penetration of bullets.

3. A frame of iron and wood, representing a large section of armour-plating, and mounted in position for determining the destructive power of shot, shell, and given charges of powder.

4. A mound of earth to receive the bullets in the proof of gun-barrels. (Knight.)

B. As adj.: (See the compounds.)

 butt-shaft, * but-shaft, s. A kind of arrow, used for shooting at butts; formed without a barb, so as to stick into the butts, and yet be easily extracted. (Nares.)

"The very pin of his heart cleft with the blind bow boy's butt-shaft."—Shakesp. Rom. & Jul., ii. 4.

"Cupid's butt-shaft is too hard for Hercules' club."—Shakesp. Love's Labour Lost, i. 2.

(2) The butter of Scripture: In most cases curdled or inspissated milk.

"And he took butter and milk, and the calf which he had dressed, and set it before them."—Genesis xviii. 8.

2. Fig.: A substance resembling butter in consistency, or in any other obvious quality. (II. 2.)

II. Technically:

1. Dairy-work, Comm., &c.: The fatty portion of milk or cream solidified by churning. In the making of butter, the cream is collected from time to time and kept in a cool state. When a sufficient quantity of cream has been obtained, it is transferred to a churn or other suitable apparatus, and kept constantly agitated, until the butter forms. In order to preserve the flavour and colour, it is important that the agitation should be as regular as possible, and that the temperature of the churn should never exceed 64° Fahr. As soon as the churning is finished, the butter is thoroughly washed with cold water to free it from the adhering butter-milk, and a small quantity of salt, not exceeding 2 per cent., is worked into it.

Pure butter should consist entirely of the fat, with a small and variable quantity of water; but in the process of manufacture it is found impossible to exclude altogether the other constituents of the milk. We find, therefore, in genuine butter, from 0.2 to 1 per cent. of casein, or curd, and a trace of milk sugar. The "fat" of butter consists of the glycerides of the insoluble fatty acids, stearic, palmitic, and oleic, in combination with from 5 to 7 per cent. of the glycerides of the soluble or volatile fatty acids, principally butyric. The characteristic taste and smell of butter are chiefly due to the presence of these volatile acids.

For many years it was held by chemists of considerable repute that milk fat was identical in every respect to pure beef and mutton fat, and that there were no means of detecting foreign fat, when added to butter. This difficulty is now overcome, and detection of such adulterations can be easily made.

Butter making in the United States has of recent years been largely performed in creameries, or butter factories, each of which uses the material supplied by a considerable number of farms. These were instituted to overcome the difficulty of obtaining good results in small establishments, and their results have been excellent. By employing the co-operative principle farmers are enabled to employ the best trained and most skilful operators, to introduce the best machinery and other appliances, the purpose being to keep the product up to a uniformly high standard. The result of a well-conducted concern, which is now well known, is securing a price always above that realized for farm-made butter. Another part of the work of many of the creameries is the conversion of skim milk into cheese, some pure cream being first added to make up for the loss of the butter-fat. Of late years the American creamery system has been introduced into British dairies in Ireland, with a considerable improvement in the quality of the butter. [Creamery, Centrifugal separators are used, as in America, to remove the cream from the milk as soon as possible, the skim milk being sold while still sweet and fresh.]

Butter is an article of food very frequently adulterated, the chief adulterants being water, curd, and prepared animal fats. The quantity of water in butter should never exceed 15 per cent. In some cases as much as 30 per cent. has been found. Curd is used in some parts of Ireland to increase the bulk and weight of the butter; any excess above 4 per cent should be considered an adulteration. Animal fats, as the fat of beef, mutton, and pork, are prepared on a large scale, and extensively sold and eaten under the names of "butterine," "oleo-margarine," &c. These are frequently added to butter to the extent of from 5 to 10 per cent. [BUTTERINE.] No loss as the fats used are pure and good, and the purchasers know that they are not buying butter, but a mixture of butter and fat, there can be no objection to its sale; but when this mixture is sold as genuine butter, as a genuine butter price, the seller renders himself justly liable to the heaviest penalties. An excessive quantity of common salt is sometimes added to butter for the purpose of causing it to absorb and hold more water. Fresh butter should not contain more than 2 per cent. of salt, whilst salt butter should never exceed 6 per cent.

1. Botany:

Butter and eggs: Several plants, the flowers of which are of two shades of yellow, spec.: (1) Narcissus pseudonarcissus; (2) N. incomparabilis; (3) N. biflorus; (4) N. poeticus; (5) the double-flowered variety of N. aurantius; and (6) Linaria vulgaris, with other plants of which the name butter and eggs is known only locally. (Britten & Holland.)

2. Vegetable Chem.: A name given to certain concrete fat oils, which continue of a butyraceous consistence at ordinary temperatures.

(1) Butter & Tallow: A greasy juice found in various parts of the butter and tallow tree but specially in the fruit.

¶ Butter and Tallow Tree: The Pentadesma butyracea, a Sierra Leone tree belonging to the order Clusiaceæ, or Guttifers. It has large handsome flowers, and opposite coriaceous leaves with parallel veins. [(1).]

(2) Butter of Cocoa: A concrete oil, obtained from the seeds of Theobroma cacao.

(3) Butter of Canara: A solid oil, obtained from the fruits of Vateria indica, and called Piney-tallow.

• 3. Inorganic Chem.: Old names for various chemical compounds, specially for chlorids. They were so called from their soft butyraceous consistence.

¶ (1) Butter of Antimony: Sesquichloride of antimony, terchloride of antimony. [ANTIMONY.]

(2) Butter of Arsenic: Sesquichloride of arsenic.

(3) Butter of Bismuth: Chloride of bismuth.

(4) Butter of Sulphur: Precipitated sulphur.

(5) Butter of Tin: Sublimated muriate of tin, perchloride of tin.

(6) Butter of Zinc: Chloride of zinc.

B. As adjective: (See the compounds.)

butter bird, s. A name given in Jamaica to the Bobolink (Dolichonyx oryzivorus).

butter boat, s. A small vessel for holding melted butter at table.

"No doubt it was for fear of the soup, and the butter-boats, and the like."—Scott: St. Ronan's, ch. xxii.

butter bur, s. [So called because the country housewives used to wrap their butter in the large leaves of these plants.] The English name of Petasites, a genus of Compositæ. The Common Butter-bur (Petasites vulgaris) is a rank weed growing commonly in Britain in wet meadows and by roadsides. The root creeps to a distance. The pale flowers, which appear before the leaves, are attractive to bees. The leaves are very large.

butter-dock, butter dock, s. A plant, Rumex obtusifolius.

butter fish, s. [So called from a copious mucous secretion on its skin.]

Ichthyol.: The Spotted Gunnel (Murænoides guttatus).

butter-jags, s. pl. Two plants, (1) Lotus corniculatus, (2) Medicago falcata.

Husbandry: An implement by which pats of butter of a given size are shaped and printed for market. (Knight.) butter-print, s. A piece of carved wood, used to mark butter. It is called also a BUTTER-STAMP.

butter-scotch, s. A sort of sheep-dog.

butter-stamp, s. The same as BUTTER-PRINT (q.v.).

butter-tongs, s. An implement for cutting and transferring pieces of butter.

• butter tooth, s. An incisor tooth.

Bot.: A name given to several trees belonging to the order Sapotaceæ.

1. Indian Butter-tree (Bassia: species). It is called also the Phulwara. It is a native of Nepaul and the Almorah hills. A white fatty substance is pressed from its seeds. It can be burnt, makes good soap, and is used to adulterate ghee, to dress the hair, and as an application in rheumatism. The juice of the flowers furnishes a kind of sugar.

2. The African Butter-tree, or Shea-tree (Bassia Parkii). It produces the galam-butter mentioned by Mungo Park. The "butter" is a white fatty substance extracted from the seeds by boiling them in water. It is an important article of commerce at Sierra Leone.

Agric.: An implement for pressing and rolling butter to free it of the buttermilk. It may be a fluted roller working in a bowl or on a board, or a conical roller on a slanting board, which permits the buttern to run off. (Knight.)

• but-ter (2), s. [BITTERN.] (Scotch. Jamieson.) butter-bump, s. The bittern (Johnson.)

but-ter (3), s. [BUTT, v.]

Wood-working: A machine for sawing off the ends of boards, to render them square and to remove faulty portions.

but-ter, v.t. [From Eng. butter, s. (q.v.). In Ger. buttern; Fr. beurrer.]

2. Figuratively:

(1) With "bread" for the object: To make any thing in one's lot more palatable.

¶ To butter both sides of one's bread: To attempt to obtain advantages from more sides than one.

"Upon all topics . . . twas besides his bread
Of which he buttered both sides; . . . would delay."
Byron: The Vision of Judgment, xi.

(2) With a person for the object: To flatter, to coax. (Vulgar.)

• II. Gaming: To increase the stakes every throw or every game. (A cant term.) (Jodrell.) [BUTTERING.]

• but-ter-egged, a. [BUTTERNESSED.]

"Infatuated, vaulted, and charter-ised sufficiently butter-egged. . . ."—A Journey through England (1740). (Halliwell: Contrib. to Lowndes.) but-ter-cup, † but-ter cups, s. [Eng. butter; cup.] [BUTTERFLOWER.] A name given to the Ranunculus genus, and specially to Ranunculus acris, R. bulbosus, R. repens, R. Ficaria, and R. aurieomus. (Britten & Holland, &c.)

Water Buttercup: Two plants, (1) Ranunculus aquatilis, (2) Caltha palustris.

but-ter-fly, s. [Second element doubtful.] A local name for the Avocet (q.v.).

but-ter-flow-er, s. [Eng. butter; flower. So called, apparently, because the common people thought that the yellow colour of butter arose from the cattle eating these plants, which they never do. (Curtis.)]

1. Gen.: The same as buttercup; the popular English name of the plants belonging to the genus Ranunculus.

2. Specially:

(1) One of the names popularly given to a plant, the Ranunculus bulbosus, or Bulbous Crow-foot. It is called also Buttercups, King's-cups, and, by Shakespeare, Cuckoo-buds of yellow hue. It flowers in May, and may, without digging for its root, be accurately identified by observing that the segments of its calyx are reflexed, whereas in R. repens, often confounded with it, they are tolerably erect.

"The watered meadows are yellow with butter-flowers."—Aubrey: Nat. Hist. of Wilts. (Introd. to Wiltshire.)

(2) Ranunculus acris.

(3) R. repens.

(4) R. Ficaria.

(5) R. aurieomus.

Great Butterflower: A ranunculaceous plant (Caltha palustris).

It may be from appearing at the beginning of the season for butter, or because some species are yellow, or because the droppings of some are butter-like.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1 Lit.: In the same sense as II.

2. Fig.: A person who is dressed attractively, but is shallow in intellect and of no perceptible use to society.

"The fops are painted butterflies."
Pope: To Mr. the Happy Instance, 17.

II. Entom.: The English name for any species of the Diurnal Lepidoptera, or Rhopalocera. The antennæ end in a club; the wings in repose are generally quite upright, and there are no bristles on the hinder pair. They fly by day, whilst their allies the Hawk-moths do so by twilight, and the Moths by night. Before coming to the perfect state they exist first as the caterpillar, and afterwards in the chrysalis state. Butterflies exist in all climates except those marked by extreme cold; the tropical species are, however, most numerous, besides being the largest in size and, as a rule, the brightest in colouring. The Butterflies, or Diurnal Lepidoptera, are divided into four families Papilionidæ, Nymphalidæ, Lycænidæ, and Hesperidæ (q.v.).

B. As adj.: (See the compounds).

butterfly cock, s. A valve having two semicircular wings pivoted on a central cross-bar. A butterfly-valve.

butterfly fish, s. [Named from the colour.] A name for a fish, the Ocellated Blenny (Blennius ocellaris). It has the dorsal fin bilobate. Its anterior lobe is elevated and marked with a round and black spot, surrounded with a white circle and a black one. It is found in our seas.

butterfly net, s. A net of very fine gauze, attached to a handle, and used by entomologists for capturing butterflies, moths, &c.

Mech.: A nut having two wings attached, so that it may be easily turned by hand.

Bot.: A common book name for two varieties of orchis, viz. (1) Habenaria chlorantha; (2) Habenaria bifolia.

Botany:

1. The name of an Orchid (Oncidium papilio) brought from Trinidad. It is so called because its large yellow and red blossoms, poised on slender footstalks so as to vibrate with every breath of wind that blows, resemble butterflies hovering on the wing.

2. The Indian Butterfly Plant, Phalænopsis amabilis of Lindley, not of Blume, is another Orchid. It is a very beautiful epiphyte.

Bot.: Somewhat resembling the aspect of a butterfly on the wing. Used especially of the corolla, in what have been called, from the same circumstance, papilionaceous flowers. [PAPILIONACEOUS.]

butterfly-shell, s. Any shell of the genus Voluta.

butterfly-valve, s. A double clack-valve, each leaf of which is hinged to a bar crossing the passage-way. There are butterfly pump-valves and butterfly throttle-valves.

butterfly weed, s. A plant (Asclepias tuberosa).

but-ter-ine, s. [From Eng. butter, and suff. -ine.] A substance prepared in imitation of butter from animal or vegetable fats. The fat is first freed from all impurities, and by heat converted into oleïn. The oleïn is then transferred to a churn containing a small quantity of milk, and churned into butterine. Lastly, it is coloured, in imitation of butter. Freshly prepared, it is sweet and palatable, and when spread on bread or cold toast, is but slightly inferior to a fair quality butter. Butterine is imported into this country under various names, "Oleomargarine," "Oleine butter," "Normandy Oleine butter," &c. It is frequently used to adulterate butter. [MARGARINE.]

"... there was a manufactory for 'butterine,' which no sooner got into the shops than it lost the 'ine.'"—Mr H. C. Bartlett, in Times.

bŭt'-tẽr-ĭng (Eng.), bŭt'-tẽr-ĭn' (Scotch), pr. par. & s. [BUTTER, v.]

A. As present participle: (See the verb.)

"It is a fine simile in one of Mr. Congreve's prologues, which compares a writer to a buttering gamester, that stakes all his winning upon one cast, so that if he loses the last throw he is sure to be undone."—Addison.

B. As substantive: Flattery. (Scotch.)

bŭt'-tẽr-ĭs, s. [From Fr. boutoir = a tool used by carriers and farriers; Prov. boutezan (l).]

Farriery: A knife with a bent shank, used by blacksmiths to pare the hoofs of horses. It has a blade like a chisel, and is operated by a thrust movement, the handle resting against the shoulder.

bŭt'-tẽr-man, s. [Eng. butter; man.] A man who sells butter.

bŭt'-tẽr-milk, s. [Eng. butter; milk. In Ger. buttermilch.] That part of the milk which remains when the butter is extracted.

"A young man, fallen into an ulcerous consumption, devoted himself to buttermilk."—Harvey.

Min.: Dana's rendering of the German term Buttermilcherz, a mineral, the same as Cerargyrite (q.v.).

bŭt'-tẽr-nŭt, s. [Eng. butter; nut.] The English name of a North American tree, called also the Oil-nut and the White Walnut. It is the Juglans cinerea. It has oblong, lanceolate, serrate leaflets, downy beneath. The petioles are viscid and the fruit oblong ovate. It grows to the height of thir[illegible]. The North American Indians use the [illegible] tic[illegible].

bŭt'-tẽr-wēed, s. [En[illegible]wed.] A composite plant, Erigero[illegible].

bŭt'-tẽr-wife, s. [Eng. wife.] A woman who sells butter. [BUTTERWOMAN.]

"Divers of the queen's and the said duchess's kindred and servants, and a butterwife, were indicted of suspicion of treason, ..."—Ld. Herbert. Hist of K. Hen. VIII., p. 473.

* bŭt'-tẽr-wŏm-an, s. [Eng. butter; woman.] A woman who sells butter. [BUTTERWIFE.]

"Tongue, I must put you into a butter-woman's mouth, ..."—Shakesp.: All's Well, iv. 1.

bŭt'-tẽr-wŏrt, s. [From Eng. butter, A.S. butere, and A.S. wyrt = wort, an herb, a plant. The leaves coagulate milk, like rennet.]

Botany:

1. Sing.: The English name of Pinguicula, a genus of plants constituting the typical one of the order Lentibulariaceæ (Butterworts). The Common Butterwort has the leaves, which are thick and greasy to the touch, all radical. The flowers are in single-flowered scapes, purple in colour, with a spur. The capsule is one-celled. Common in Scotland, less so in England. There are three other British species of the genus, the Large-flowered (Pinguicula grandiflora), the Alpine (P. alpina), and the Pale (P. lusitanica). The alpine one has yellowish flowers.

2. Plur.: Lindley's name for the order Lentibulariaceæ. The type is Pinguicula. [See 1.]

A. As adjective:

1. Having the appearance of butter.

2. Possessing the qualities of butter.

"Nothing more convertible into hot choleric humours than its buttery parts."—Harvey.

B. As substantive:

1. A room in which butter, milk, &c., are kept, a pantry.

2. The room in which provisions are kept. (Now chiefly at colleges, in the universities.)

"Now sought the castle buttery."
Scott: The Lay of the Last Minstrel, vi. 8.

bŭt'-tĭng, * but-tinge, pr. par. & s. [BUTT, v.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As subst.: The act of striking.

"Buttinge with sharpe speres."—Bancock, 2,220.

Carp.: The same as butt-joint (q.v.).

butting-machine, s.

Machinery: A machine having planing-cutters on the face of a disc-wheel, and used for smoothing, cornering, or rounding the ends of joists or small timbers used in the frames of agricultural implements, etc. The stuff is laid alongside the fence or gage, and is fed up endwise to the cutter. (Knight.) butting-ring, s.

Vehicles: A collar on the axle against which the hub butts, and which limits the inward movement of the wheel, as the linch-pin or axle-nut does the outward.

butting-saw, s. A cross-cut saw attached to a stock at one end, and used for butting logs on the carriage of a saw-mill.

A. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang. (generally in the pl. buttocks): The rump, the protuberant part behind.

"The tail of a fox was never made for the buttocks of an ape."—L'Estrange: Fables.

2. Shipbuilding: The rounded-in, overhanging part on each side and in front of the rudder; terminating beneath by merging into the run.

B. As adj.: (See the compounds.)

buttock-lines, s. pl. The curves shown by a vertical longitudinal section of the after-part of a ship's hull, parallel to the keel. A similar section forward exhibits the bow-lines, and a continuous section through the whole length of the ship the buttock and bow-lines.

* buttock-mail, s. A fine imposed on any one convicted of fornication in lieu of his sitting on the stool of repentance. (Scotch.)

"... yer buttock-mail, and yer stool of repentance."—Scott: Waverley, ch. xxx.

bŭt'-tŏcked, * bŭt'-tŏckt, a. [Eng. buttock; -ed.]

In compos.: Having buttocks of a particular type.

"... sharp rumped and pin buttockt also."—Holland: Pliny, xxix. 6.

bŭt'-tŏn, * bot-hum, * bot-on, * bot-vn, * bot-wyn, * bot-wn, * bot-un, s. & a. [From Fr. bouton = a bud, a button (Littré); Norm. Fr., Prov. & Sp. boton; Port. botao; Ital. bottone. Cf. Gael. (from Eng.) putan; Wel. botwm. From Fr. bouter = to put forth, to thrust.]

A. As substantive:

† 1. A bud, spec., a small bud.

"The canker galls the infants of the spring Too oft before their buttons be disclosed."
Shakesp.: Hamlet, i. 3.

"Fair from its humble bed I reared this flow'r, Suckled, and cheer'd with air, and sun, and show'r;
Bid it on the paper ruff its leaves I spread,
Bright with the gilded button tipt its head."
Pope: Dunciad, iv. 446.

2. A knob or protuberance fastened to another body.

(1) Gen.: In the foregoing sense.

"We fastened to the marble certain wires, and a button."—Boyle.

(2) Specially:

(a) A knob on a cap. (Lit. & fig.) (In the case of Chinese mandarins rank is denoted by the material of which the button is composed.)

"On fortune's cap we are not the very button."—Shakesp. Hamlet, ii. 2.

(b) A catch to fasten the dress. It fits into a button-hole. [II., 1.]

"Botun (botun, P.) Bote, fibula, nodulus."—Prompt. Parv.

"Pray you, undo this button."
Shakesp. King Lear, v. 3.

(c) The unexpanded head of a mushroom.

¶ Not worth a button: Not of any value.

"And once but taste of true Welsh mutton Your English sheeps not worth a button."
Welsh Rarebit (ed. 1864).

† 3. A name for the sea-urchin (Echinus).

II. Technically:

1. Button-manufacture: A small circular disk or knob of mother-of-pearl, horn, metal, or other material, with a shank for attachment to an object, and made to pass into a hole formed in another object for its reception, the two fastening the object together. Its chief use is to unite parts of a dress together. The ancient method of fastening dresses was by means of pins, brooches, buckles, and tie-strings. Buttons of brass are found on dresses of the 16th century. The metallic button manufacture of England dates in 1070, and in 1687 became located specially in Birmingham. Gilt buttons were first made in 1768, and others of papier mâché in 1[illegible].

2. Carpentry, &c.:

(1) A small piece of wood or metal, swivelled by a screw through the middle, and used as a fastening for a door or gate.

(2) A knob on a sliding bolt.

3. Metallurgy: A globule of metal remaining in the cupel after fusion.

4. Harness. The button of the rein: A leathern ring with the reins passing through it, which runs along the length of the rein.

5. Music:

(1) Of an organ: A small [illegible] leather which, when screwed on the [illegible] wire of a tracker, prevents it [illegible] out of place. (Stainer & Barrett.)

(2) Of an accordion: One of the keys of the first-made accordions. (Stainer & [illegible].)

B. As adj.: (See the subjoined compounds.)

button-and-loop, * button and loop, s.

Naut.: A short piece of rope, having one end a walnut knob crowned, and the other end an eye. It is used as a becket to stow ropes in. (Ogilvie.) button-blank, s. A circular blank cut out of any material and designed to be fabricated into a button.

button-brace, s. A tool for making buttons. The handle is like the [illegible] brace; the bit has cutters, but no router, and removes a circular blank or planchet of mother-of-pearl, wood, or whatever the material may be, in an annular bit operating like a crown-saw or trephine. (Knight.) button-bung, s. [From Eng. button, and bung = a cant term for a pocket or purse. A stealer of buttons. (As Age for Apes.)

button-bush, s. The Cephalanthus occidentalis, a plant belonging to the order Cinchonaceæ (Cinchonads). It is a bushy shrub, with leaves either simply opposite or in whorls of three, and yellowish-white flowers in globular heads.

button-flower, s. The English name of Gomphia, a genus of plants belonging to the order Ochnaceæ (Ochnads). It has very beautiful flowers, with serrated, shining leaves and long spikes of brilliant yellow flowers. Two species have been introduced from Jamaica.

button-hold, v.t. To hold by the button so as to detain; hence to detain (a person against his will) in conversation.

button holder, s. One who detains another in conversation against his will.

button-hole, s. [BUTTONHOLE.]

button-hook, s. A hook for grasping a button below the head, in order to draw it through the button-hole and fasten it.

button-key, s. A spring-clasp, the forked ends of which, being passed through the shank of a button, expand so as to hold the loop in position and keep the button in place. A piece of coiled wire, making two or more turns, is also used for this purpose. It is called also a button-fastener.

button-lathe, s. A machine for cutting round discs from plates of horn, bone, wood, mother-of-pearl, &c.

Weaving: A loom for weaving button-blank coverings.

button-mould, s. A dusk of bone, wood, or metal, to be covered with fabric to form a button.

button-riveting, a. Riveting, or designed to rivet, a button.

bū'-tȳl, s. [From Gr. βούτυρον (bouturon), βούτυρος (bouturos) = butter, and ὕλη (hulē) = . . . matter as a principle of being.]

Chem.: An organic monad fatty radical, having the formula (C_4H_9)'; also called Quartyl, or Tetryl, from its containing four carbon atoms.

Chem.: $C_4H_{10}O$ = quartyl alcohols, or tetryl alcohols. Four alcohols having this formula are known, two primary, one secondary, and one tertiary; they are metameric with ethylic ether. They are, (1) Normal Butyl Alcohol, or Propyl Carbinol, $C\begin{cases}CH_2.CH_2.CH_3\\H_2\\OH\end{cases}$. (2) Isobutyl Alcohol, or Isopropyl Carbinol, $C\begin{cases}CH(CH_3)_2\\H_2\\OH\end{cases}$. (3) Secondary Butylic Alcohol, or Methyl-ethyl Carbinol, $C\begin{cases}CH_3\\C_2H_5\\H\\OH\end{cases}$, $C_4H_8(OH)_4$, and (4) Tertiary Butyl Alcohol, or Trimethyl Carbinol, $C\begin{cases}(CH_3)_3\\OH.\end{cases}$

Chem.: $CH_3.CH_2.CH_2.CO.H$. It is obtained by distilling a mixture of butyrate and formate of calcium. It boils at 75°. By the action of iodine and phosphorus it is converted into normal butyl iodide, and by that of nascent hydrogen into normal butyl alcohol. Butyl, or butyric aldehyde, heated with alcoholic ammonia, forms dibutyraldine, $C_{16}H_{17}ON$, which distilled yields paraconine butyl carbinol, s.

Chem.: [AMYL ALCOHOL.]

bū-tȳl'-ē-mīde, s. [Eng., &c., butyl, and amide (q.v.).]

Chem.: $C_4H_7O.NH_2$ is a crystalline compound which melts at 115°, and boils at 216°.

bū-tȳl'-ē-mīne, s. [Eng. butyl; amine.]

Chem.: $C_4H_{11}N$, or $C_4H_9\atop H\atop H\end{}\Big\}N$. There are a Normal Butylamine, $CH_3(CH_2)_3NH_2$; an Isobutylamine, $CH(CH_3)_2CH_2.NH_2$; a Secondary Butylamine, $\left.\begin{matrix}H_3C\\H_5C_2\end{matrix}\right\}CH.NH_2$; and a Tertiary Butylamine, or Katabutylamine, $(CH_3)_3C.NH_2$.

bū'-tȳl-ēne, s. [From Eng., &c., butyl, and suffix -ene.] bū-tȳr-ā'-çē-oŭs, a. [In Fr. butyreux. From Lat. butyrum = butter, and suffix -aceus.] Having the consistency of butter.

Chem.: The same as BUTENE (q.v.).

bū'-tȳr-āte, s. [From Lat. butyr(um); and Eng., &c., suffix -ate.] [BUTYRIC ACID.]

bū-tȳr-ĕl'-lite, s. [From Lat. butyrum = butter, and dimin. suffix -ellum, with Eng. suffix -ite (Min.) (q.v.).]

Min.: An acid hydrocarbon, called also Bog-butter and Butyrite. Its consistency is like that of the substance after which it is named. It crystallises in needles. It is soluble in alcohol or ether. Its colour is white. Compos.: Carbon, 75·6; hydrogen, 12·5; oxygen, 12,5 = 100. It is derived from the Irish peat bogs. (Dana.) bū tȳr'-ic, a. [Lat. butyr(um); and Eng. suff. -ic.] Connected with butter (q.v.).

Normal Butyric Acid: $C\begin{cases}CH_2CH_2CH_3\\O''\\OH\end{cases}$

= propyl formic acid, or ethyl acetic acid Obtained by the oxidation of normal butyl alcohol with chromic acid; also by the action of alkali s on normal propyl cyanide, or by the action of hydriodic acid on succinic acid; also by saponification of butter which contains tributyrin; and by the fermentation of sugar in contact with putrid cheese and chalk, calcium lactate is first formed which decomposes into butyrate, which is then distilled with sulphuric acid. Butyric acid is a colourless liquid, boiling at 164°. Its salts are called butyrates, and are soluble in water. By oxidation with nitric acid it yields succinic acid. Isobutyric acid, $C_4H_8O_2+3O$ yields $H_2O+C_2H_4(CO.OH)_2$. $C\begin{cases}CH(CH_3)_2\\O''\\OH\end{cases}$ = Isopropionic formic acid, or dimethyl-acetic acid, obtained by oxidising isobutyl alcohol, or by the action of alkalies on isopropyl cyanide. It is a colourless liquid, boiling at 154°. Both these acids form fragrant ethers with ethyl.

¶ Butyric acid has an odour of rancid butter. It is found in sweat, urine, and other fluids, and, as a neutral fat, in small quantities in milk. It is the chief product of the second stage of lactic fermentation. [DEXTROSE.]

butyric ether, s. The same as ETHYL BUTYRATE (q.v.).

bū'-tȳr-īte, s. [From Lat. butyr(um), and suffix -ite (Min.) (q.v.).]

Min.: The same as Butyrellite (q.v.).

bū'-tȳr-ōne, s. [Lat. butyrum; and Eng., &c., ketone.]

Chem.: A ketone of the fatty series, also called dipropyl ketone, $CO\begin{cases}CH_2.CH_2.CH_3\\CH_2.CH_2.CH_3\end{cases}$. It boils at 144°, and, by the action of oxidizing agents, it is converted into butyric acid, $CH_3.CH_2.CH_2.CO.OH$, and propionic acid, $CH_3.CH_2.CO.OH$. It can be obtained by the dry distillation of calcium butyrate.

bū'-tȳr-ŭs, a. [From Lat. butyrum = butter, and Eng. suffix -ous.] Having the properties of butter.

"Its oily red part is from the butyrous parts of chyle." Floyer.

bŭx-bāu'-mi-ȧ, s. [Named after John Christian Buxbaum, a German who published a botanical work on Asia Minor in 1728.]

Bot.: A genus of mosses containing a solitary species (Buxbaumia aphylla), so like a fungus that it might be easily mistaken for one. It is found, though rarely, in Britain.

¶ Buxbaumia is by some made the type of an order, Buxbaumiaceæ.

* bŭx-ē-ŏŭs, a. [From Lat. buxus = (1) of boxwood; (2) of the colour of boxwood; buxus = the box-tree.] Pertaining to the box-tree.

¶ The Buzzards are birds of prey, belonging to the family of Falconidæ, and approach nearly to the eagles in appearance and general character, though not their equal in strength and courage. In the United States and Canada the Rough-legged Buzzard (Archibuteo lagopus) is a bird of common occurrence, and is equally plentiful in the Eastern Hemisphere. The Red-tailed Hawk (Buteo borealis) is another American Buzzard, and one in very bad repute among the farmers and housewives of the United States, from its frequent attacks upon the tenants of the poultry yard. This habit has given it the title of Hen Hawk. The Common Buzzard of Europe (Buteo vulgaris) is plentiful in all the wooded parts of that continent, as well as in North Africa and Western Asia. This bird measures nearly four feet from tip to tip of the expanded wings, and is a very useful bird of prey, from its destruction of mice, adders and similar noxious animals. The Turkey Buzzard of the United States, a common scavanger in some of the southern cities, does not call for description here, as it is not properly a buzzard, but belongs to the family of vultures.

Capped-buzzard: [HONEY-BUZZARD.]

Honey-buzzard: The English name of a predatory bird, the Pernis apivorus, called also the Beehawk, or the Brown Beehawk. [HONEY-BUZZARD.]

• ¶ Of the part in relation to the whole:

"He tok his chylde by the hande."—Isumbras, 225

¶ Regarding the distinction between with and by, Johnson says that by is commonly used after a verb neuter, while with would be put after an active one. Blair says both these particles express the connection between some instrument, or means of effecting an end, and the agent who employs it; but with expresses a more close and immediate connection, by a more remote one. We kill a man with a sword; he dies by violence. The criminal is bound with ropes by the executioner. In a passage of Dr. Robertson's History of Scotland, we are told that when one of the old kings was making an enquiry into the tenure by which his nobles held their lands, they started up and drew their swords: "By these," said they "we acquired our lands, and with these we will defend them." (Blair: Lectures on Rhetoric & Belles Lettres, ed. 1817, vol. i. p. 233.)

Spenser: F. Q., VII vii 27.

(c) Of time:

'(i) At once, as soon as possible, quick, immediately.

"I will that thou give me by and by in a charger the head of John the Baptist."—Mark vi 25

¶ In the Greek of this verse, by and by is ἐξ αὐτῆς (ex autēs) = at the very point of time; at once; from ἐξ αὐτῆς τῆς ὥρας (ex autēs tēs hōras) — from this very time. [illegible]

(ii) After a short time; after a time. As Trench well shows, the tendency of mankind to procrastination has altered the meaning of this phrase from "at once, immediately," to "after a time."

† (2) As subst.: The future.

"In the sweet by and by,
We shall meet on that beautiful shore."
Sankey: Hymns & S.

by-zănt, s. [BEZANT.]

By-zăn-tian, a. [Lat. &c. Byzanti(um) = the city (BYZANTINE), and suff. -an.] Pertaining to Byzantium.

Byz-an-tine, By-zăn-tine, a. & s. [In Ger. byzantinisch; Fr byzantin; Lat. Byzantinus. From Lat. Byzantium; Gr. Βυζάντιον (Byzantion) = Byzantium. From a probably mythic Byzas, a Megarian, said to have been its founder.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining to Byzantium, a Dorie-Greek city on the European side of the Bosphorus, alleged to have arisen about B.C. 656. A new and more magnificent quarter, added by Constantine between A.D. 328 and 330, was called Constantinople, and occupied the site of part of the modern Turkish city.

¶ (1) Byzantine architecture:

Arch.: The style of architecture prevalent at Byzantium whilst it was the capital of the Greek empire in the East. The Byzantine churches are usually built in the form of a Greek cross, the centre being covered by a large cupola, and the four arms or projections by semicupolas. The arches are generally semicircular, but sometimes segmental or horse-shoe shaped. The capitals, which taper downwards, are square blocks, ornamented with foliage or with basket-work. The masonry is varied by horizontal and sometimes by vertical lines of bricks, besides which tiles, arranged so as to constitute the Greek letter gamma, or other figures, are often found on the exterior of the building. Internally, there is fine Mosaic ornamentation. The mouldings, which have a bold projection, with the angles rounded off, are ornamented with foliage, and sometimes also with morocco or painting. A zigzag ornament, with stiff foliage, may be seen under the eaves and elsewhere. The apse is continually present. The Byzantine style of architecture has been divided into three periods—the first from the time of Constantine to that of Justinian in the middle of the sixth century; the second extends to the eleventh century, and the third to the conquest of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453. Few specimens of the first period remain, many of the second and third do so, the former being considered pure Byzantine, the latter Byzantine mingled with Italian, from the influence produced by Venice. [See Gloss. of Architecture (Oxford, 1845).]

The most interesting example of this architecture now existing is the grand Mosque of St. Sophia at Constantinople, an edifice built as a Christian church, under Justinian, in the first half of the sixth century, and adapted to their use by the Mohammedans, on their conquest of the Eastern Empire. In this building the interior is composed of a great central dome, 107 feet in diameter and 182 feet in height, which is supported on four piers, while length is given the building by the addition of a semi-dome at each end. The latter serve also to sustain the pressure of the main dome. The building, in its lower part, is divided up with small pillars and arches, whose effect is to enhance the size and grandeur of the great dome. Around the base of the latter is a row of windows, a characteristic which became a constant feature in the later Byzantine architecture, the striking characteristic of Byzantine edifices is the extensive use of colored decoration in their interior. This is particularly the case in the Mosque of St. Sophia, and adds much to its interior effect. The pillars are formed of the richest colored marbles, and the walls lined with them, while splendid mosaics adorn the domes.

Byzantine ornament differs considerably alike from the Classic and from the Gothic, being always flat and incised, while the latter is bold. The Byzantines were distinguished during the Mediæval period for all kinds of carving and metal work, which undoubtedly had an influence on the development of art, while their mural illuminations led the way to the revival of painting. A well-known and very interesting example of Byzantine architectural art exists in the celebrated Church of St. Mark's, at Venice. This is the only example in the West, and doubtless arose through the commercial relations of Venice with the Eastern Empire. It was copied shortly after its erection, in the eleventh century, at Perigueux, in Aquitania, and, as a consequence, the use of the dome has been extensive in that part of France.

(2) Byzantine historians:

Hist.: Numerous historians proper, and chroniclers who lived in the Byzantine empire between the fourth and fifteenth centuries A.D., and wrote its history. The most celebrated was Procopius, of Cæsarea. These historians are divided into three classes: (1) Those whose works are confined in subject to Byzantine history; (2) those who profess to deal with universal history, but give disproportionate space to Byzantine events; (3) those who wrote on Byzantine customs, architecture, antiquities, &c. Their literary style is lacking in force and originality, as might be expected from the despotism of pedantry during the time in which they wrote, but despite this their works are invaluable, as our only sources of information concerning the history of the Empire of the East. This is particularly the case with those who confine their attention to events which took place under their own observation, or in which they took part. The principal works of the Byzantine historians were collected and published in Paris in 36 volumes, with Latin translations (1645-1711). In 1828 Niebuhr, with others, began a Corpus Scriptorum Historiæ Byzantinæ, carried on until 1855 in 48 volumes, and continued by the Berlin Academy of Sciences

B. As subst.: The same as bezant, blrant, byzant. [BEZANT.]

¶ If any obsolete words have been omitted in by, their modern spelling will probably be found at bi, be, or bu.

¶ A list of words in which by is a prefix has been given in page 783, column 1. The following more simple words have the modern spelling bi, at which they may be found.—Examples: * byche, * bycke (= bitch), * byde, * byge (= big), * byke, * bykerr, s. (= bicker, s.), * bykker, * bykkir, * bycur, * bykkyr, v. (= bicker, v.); * byl, * bylle (= bill), bynde, s. (= bind), * bynge, s. (= bing (2)), s.t., * byrde (= bird), * byrk (= birk) (Scotch), * byrle (= birl, 1), * byrthe, * byschop (= bishop), * byschyprycke (= bishopric), * bysmr (= bism, Scotch), * bysquyte (= biscuit), * bysshope (= bishop), * byssheprike (= bishopric), * byte (= bite), * bytt (= bit, s.), * buttyr (= bitter), * bytterly (= bitterly), * buttyrnesse (= bitterness), * bittyrsweete (= bitter-sweet), * bytyn (= bite), * byty (= biting).

(2) A very few others are found with the spelling be. Examples—* bynygere (= lenger), * bytylle (= beetle).

(3) Sometimes the old by becomes bu in a modern word. Examples—* byrdune, * byrdens (= burden), * byrycle (= burial), * byryen, byryyn (= bury), * byryyd (= buried), * byschelle * byushel (= bushel), * busy (= busy), busily (= busily), * busynesse (= business).

C.

C, In Anglo-Saxon was taken directly from the Latin alphabet, the source, it is believed, whence it has passed into various languages. In English words immediately derived from Anglo-Saxon, the c of the Anglo-Saxon often becomes k in English, as A.S. cyning = Eng. king; A.S. cyn = Eng. kin, or kindred. Sometimes the A.S. c becomes q in English, as A.S. cwen = Eng. queen. At others it is changed into ch, as A.S. cild = Eng. child (See Bosworth's A.S. Dict.) In Modern English c has two leading values. Before i and e it is sounded as s (examples: certain, cincture), and before a, o, and u as k (examples: cat, cost, curtly). It is mute before k, as trick.

C, As an initial is used:

1. In Chronol.: Chiefly for Christ, as B.C. = (Before Christ).

¶ In the ambiguous letters A.C., C may be (1) Christ, and A.C. = After Christ. Or it may be (2) Christum, and A.C. = ante Christum, before Christ; or (3) Christi, and A.C. = Anno Christi. See also A as an initial.

2. In Music: For counter-tenor or contralto.

3. In University degrees: For Civil, as D.C.L. Doctor of Civil Laws, also for Chirurgia = surgery.

C, As a symbol is used:

1. In Numer.: For 100. Thus CII is = 102, CC = 200, CCC = 300, CCCC = 400.

¶ C in this case is the initial of Lat. centum = 100.

2. In Chem.: For the element carbon, of which it is also the initial letter.

3. In Music:

(1) For the first note of the diatonic scale, corresponding to do of the Italians.

(2) For the natural major mode, that in which no sharps or flats are employed.

(3) For common or four-crotchet time.

4. In Biblical Criticism: For the Ephraem manuscript of the Greek New Testament, A being the Alexandrian manuscript, B the Vatican manuscript, D the manuscript of Beza, and ℵ (A in Heb.) the Sinaitic manuscript. [CODEX.]

cab (1), s. [Contracted from cabriolet (q.v.).]

1. A covered public carriage having two or four wheels, and drawn by one horse. Cabs were first used for hire in London in 1823.

¶ In a Hansom cab the driver's seat is behind, not in front. This form of cab was patented in 1834, being named after its inventor, the architect of the Birmingham town-hall. It originally consisted of a square body, the two wheels, about 7½ feet in diameter, being the same height as the vehicle. This has been from time to time modified and improved, until the present "hansom" has emerged. Cabs with india-rubber tires have been introduced and are increasing in numbers. The Hansom cab, as a convenient method of street locomotion, has been introduced into the cities of the United States, and is used there to some extent, particularly in connection with railroad stations, but can scarcely increase greatly in competition with the abundant and cheap street railway service.

2. The covered part in front of a locomotive which protects the engineer and fireman, and shields the levers, &c.

¶ Obvious compounds: Cab-driver, cab-fare, cab horse, cab-man, cab stand, &c.

cab-boy, s. A page who stands behind a cab).

"As at that time I was chiefly occupied with the desire of making so perfect a stand as my fortune would allow, I sent my cab-boy (vulgo Tiger) to inquire of the groom whether the horse was to be sold, and to whom it belonged."—Sir E. L. Bulwer: Pelham, ch. xiv.

cab (2), s. [Heb. קַב (qab) = a hollow or concave vessel); from קָבַב (qabab) = to render hollow.] A Jewish measure of capacity, mentioned only in 2 Kings vi. 25. The Rabbins make it ¼th of a seah or satum, and ¹/₁₈th of an ephah. If so then it would be 2⅔ pints of British corn measure, or 3½ pints of wine measure.

"... an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of doves dung for five pieces of silver."—2 Kings vi. 25.

cab, v.t. [CAB (1), s.] To travel in a cab, as in the popular phrase, "Do you mean to cab it?"

 cab-age, s. [CABBAGE.]

ca-bal', s. [In Ger. cabala; Fr. cabale = a club or society. Cognate with Heb. cabala and, perhaps, Eng. carl (q.v.).]

1. A small number of persons closely united for some purpose, and not making their proceedings public. At first not necessarily in a bad sense.

"She often interposed her royal authority to break the cabals which were forming against her first ministers."—Addison.

2. A junto, a small number of persons in secret conclave carrying out their purposes in Church and State by intrigue and trickery. This bad sense was acquired in the time of Charles II. (see the example.)

"During some years the word cabal was popularly used as synonymous with cabinet. But it happened by a whimsical coincidence that in 1671, the Cabinet consisted of five persons, the initial letters of whose names made up the word cabal, Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Ashley, and Lauderdale. . . . There were there, as emphatically called the Cabal, as they soon made the appellation so infamous that it has never since been used except as a term of reproach."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng. ch. ii.

"In dark cabals and nightly juntos met."—Marvell: Character of Holland, l. 1.

3. Intrigues, secret machinations.

"The numerous members of the House of Commons, who were in town, having their time on their hands, formed cabals, and heated themselves and each other by murmuring at his partiality for the country of his birth."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng. ch. xxi.

ca-bal', v.i. [In Ger. cabaliren. Fr. cabaler.] To join a cabal, to intrigue secretly with others in the hope of gaining some coveted object or end.

"... that the men who held those offices perpetually cabalting against each other."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xx.

cab-a-la, cab-bal-ah, kab-bal-a, s. [In Ger. cabbala; Fr. & Ital. cabale; from Heb. קַבָּלָה (qabala) = (1) reception, a doctrine derived from oral tradition, by (gibbel), piel of an obsolete root קָבַל (qabal) = to receive, to accept a doctrine.]

1. Historically: A system of Jewish theosophy, bearing a certain similarity to the Platonism. Its founders are considered by Dr. Ginsburg to have been Isaiah the Rabbi and his disciples Ezra and Azariah (Hilkiah), who flourished between A.D. 120 and 150, and it was designed to oppose the philosophical system of Maimonides. The cabala represented God, called אֵין סוֹף (Ain Soph), meaning Without End or Boundless, as being altogether inconceivable. He has become known, however, by means of ten intelligences called Crown, Wisdom, Intelligence, Love, Justice, &c., whom he has brought into being, and whom he created and now governs.

2. Popularly: An occult system of philosophy something hopelessly mystical and unintelligible.

"Saxon he read, whatever's printed,
Or stands in parchment rubric'd and pictured,
And every dark palmer's sacred Scott: Lord of the Isles, iv. 6 cab-al-ism, cab-bal ism, s. [Eng. cabal(a); -ism. In Ger. cabbalismus.] The system of Jewish belief called cabala (q.v.)

1. Pertaining to the cabala.

2. Mystical, mysterious, occult; hard to be understood, like the cabala.

"The letters are cabalistical, and carry more in them than it is proper for the world to be acquainted with."—Addison.

"He taught him to repeat two cabalistical words, pronouncing of which the whole secret consisted."—Spectator.

 cab-a-lis-ti-cal-ly, adv. [Eng. cabalistical; -ly.] After the manner of the cabala, in a occult manner; mystically, unintelligibly.

"Rabbi Elias from the first verse of the first chapter of Genesis, where the letter beth is numerically found, cabalistically computes that the world should endure just six thousand years, each day in computation standing for a thousand."—Sir T. Herbert: Travels, p. 124.

 cab-a-lize, * cab-bal ize, v.i. [Eng. cabal(a); -ize.] To speak, write, or reason as a cabalist.

"Here St. John seems to cabbalize, as in several places of the Apocalypse, that is to speak in the language of the learned of the Jews."—More: Apocalypsis, i. 3.

† ca-bal-ler, s. [Eng. cabal, v.; -er. In Ger. cabalier.] One who joins in a cabal or secretly intrigues with others to gain a certain end.

"Cæsar is in the Senate murthered
A number of cabalers, and lose world."—Dryden.

† cab-al-line, a. [From Lat. caballinus = pertaining to a horse; caballus = a pack-horse, a nag, a pony, &c. caballinus = a horse.]

Cf. also Sp. caballo; Ital. cavallo; Fr. cheval = a horse, cavale = a mare; Ir. capall; Rus. kobila, kobuila = a mare.] Pertaining to a horse.

Caballine Aloes: Horse Aloes (Aloe caballina). [Aloes.]

"What those caballing capstains may design
I must prevent, by taking first in mine." Dryden.

"We see me plainly that the caballists of the house have, with great prudence, reserved themselves until the preparations should be ready for their design." —King Charles I's Answer to the Propositions made by both Houses of Parliament, ed. 1644, p. 55.

'ca-ber, s. [CABERT.] (Scotch.) A lighter.

ca-bia-sou, s. [French.] A French name for a mammal, the Giant Tatou, or Armadillo (Dasypus gigas). It is the largest of the Armadillos, being sometimes three feet long without the tail.

cab back, s. [KEBBUCK.] (Scotch.) cab bage (1), 'cabb-age, 'cabb-bynche, 'cab bidge, s. [O. Fr. chou cabus = a cabbage (Cotgrave); O. Fr. caius, cabus = round-headed, great-headed. Indirectly from Lat. caput = head; Ital. capuccio = a little head; lattuga capuccia = cabbage-lettuce. (Sacchi.)]

1. Gardening: Specially those garden varieties of the Brassica oleracea which have plain leaves and "hearts," but sometimes employed in a more general sense for the genus Brassica itself. The common Cabbage is said to have been introduced into England by the Romans, but was little known in Scotland until brought into that country by Cromwell's soldiers. The principal varieties were known at least as far back as the sixteenth century, but minor varieties are coming frequently into use. These varieties differ greatly from each other, and from the original wild cabbage, and could not be recognized for the same plant but that their steps of deviation are well known. The cabbage in several of its varieties is widely grown in the United States, and is a common article of food in most sections. It varies, in its several varieties, from the Kohl-Rabi, in which the growth force is carried back into the stem, which swells into an underground turnip-like form, to the common Cabbage, in which the vegetation is developed into a compact head, and the Cauliflower, in which the flowering head is enormously developed. Other varieties are the Brussels Sprouts and the Jersey Cabbage. In the last the stem grows to a height of feet high, and supplies walking sticks and small building timber, such as spars for small thatched roofs, &c. The changes in the Cabbage are easily accounted for. The present form, is of highly vegetative character, as is shown by its habit and habitat. The surplus vegetative force may express itself simply in an increased development of the leaf, which is thrown into wavy folds, as in the common Kale, it may remain in the nodrils, which become succulent, as in the Portugal Cabbage, may be carried back into the stem, causing a food like swelling, as in the Kohl-Rabi, or a full growth of the stem, as in the Jersey Cabbage, it may be applied to the formation of buds, which develop with the peculiar luxuriance of the Brussels Sprouts; or may be withheld from the lateral buds and supplied to the apical one alone, which swells into the compact head of the common Cabbage. The most evolved and final variety is the Cauliflower, in which the vegetative force acts upon the flowering head, of which the flowering is largely checked. There are other varieties, but the above covers the diverse variations.

"Good words are good cabbage." —Shakesp. Merry Wives of Windsor, i. 1.

The leaves are large, fleshy, and of a glaucous or [illegible] head of four leaves, which are recurved at the tips; pods, containing several round seeds. Species are caboche, savoy cabbage, Brocoli, Turnip-rooted, Cauliflower. The musk cabbage. Branching tree-cabbage from the seaweed. Coleswort Perennial Alpine coleswort. Fertilated wild cabbage.

2. Ordinary Language:

(1) In the same sense as 1.

(2) The huge terminal bud of some palm trees.

"Their 'cabbage' (that of the trees of Sagnerus oleracifera is also eaten), like that of the West Indian Cabbage palm (Areca oleracea), whose huge terminal bud is known by the name." —Livingstone's Exp. Zam. (ed. 1866), 147 ¶ Brazil Cabbage: An aroid plant, Caladium sagittifolium.

Dog's cabbage: A plant—the Thelygonum Cynocrambe—which belongs either to the Chenopodiaceæ or the Urticaceæ. Though sulacid and somewhat purgative it is occasionally used as a potherb.

St. Patrick's Cabbage: One of the names of the Saxifraga umbrosa, the London pride, or "None-so-pretty," called St. Patrick's, because it is a native of Ireland.

"Lemnos-thersa, one who loves the lake.
Crambo Argus, cabbage-eater
Pope Battle of the Frogs and Mice. (Names of the Mice.)

cabbage-flea, s.

Entom.: The name sometimes given to a small leaping beetle, the Altica, or Haltica oleracea, the larvæ of which destroy seedling cabbages, as those of the allied species, A. nemorum, do young turnips.] [ALTICA.]

cabbage flower, s. The flower of the cabbage.

"Yet the pistil of each cabbage flower is surrounded not only by its own six stamens, but by those of the many other flowers on the same plant." —Darwin's Origin of Species (ed. 1859), ch. iv., p. 98.

cabbage-lettuce, s. A variety of lettuce, with leaves forming a low, full head like a cabbage.

cabbage-moth, s. A moth of the family Noctuæ (Mamestra brassicæ) cabbage-net, s. A small net to boil cabbage in.

cabbage-palm, s. [CABBAGE TREE.]

"Here the woods were ornamented by the cabbage-palm, one of the most beautiful of its family." —Dore's Voyage Round the World, ed. 1879, ch. ii., p. 25.

cabbage-rose, s. The Rosa centifolia

". . . one of which afforded a not at accurate if not picturesque view of Margate, while the other glowed with a huge wreath of cabbage-roses and jonquils." —Disraeli: Henrietta Temple, bk. vi., ch. x.

cabbage-tree, s.

1. The English name for the palm-genus Areca, and specially for the A. oleracea, the cabbage palm of the West Indies. It is so called because the bud at the top of its stem is like a cabbage, and the inner leaves which form this bud are eaten like the vegetable now mentioned, though the removal of its bud for the sake of these leaves is the destruction of the magnificent tree.

2. A garden name for Kleinia serrifolia, a composite plant.

Australian cabbage-tree: A palm-tree—the Corypha australis. Its leaves are made into hats, baskets, &c.

Bastard Cabbage tree: Andira inermis, a leguminous plant of the sub-order Cæsalpineæ cabbage-wood, s.

1. Evodendron anfractuosum, a tree belonging to the Bombaceæ, a family of the Sterculiaceæ, or Sterculiads.

2. The wood of the cabbage-tree.

"Cabbage-wood . . . is sometimes used in ornamental furniture, but does not answer very well, as the ends of the leaves are too hard and the medullary part is too soft for holding glue. The surface is, also, very difficult to polish, and cannot be preserved without varnish. The trunk, after the centre part is rotted out, forms a durable waterpipe." —Waterton. Cyclopædia of Commerce.

cabbage worm, s.

Entom.: The caterpillar, or larva of several species of moths or butterflies, especially that of the Pontia, or Pieris brassicæ, which attacks cabbages. [CABBAGE BUTTERFLY.]

cabb-bage (2), s. [Fr. cabas = a basket.] Cant word for the shreds and chippings made by tailors.

"For as tailors preserve their cabbage,
So squires take care of us, and forage."
Second Part of Hudibras (ed. 1664), p. 102.

cabb-bage (1), cabb-bidge, v.i. [From the substantive.] To form a head like that of the cabbage.

"Calmuser, to cabbidge, to grow to a head, or grow round and close together as a cabbage." —Cotgrave.

"To make lettuce cabbage they transplant it, taking care during the great heats to water it, otherwise instead of planting it runs to seed." —New Gloucestershire.

cabb-bage (2), v.t. [Fr. cabas = to put into a basket; cabas = a basket

A cant term among tailors: To steal a portion of the cloth used when a tailor is cutting out some article of dress.

"Your taylor, instead of shreads, cabbages whole yards of cloth." —Arbuthnot.

cabb-baged, pa. par. & a. [CABBAGE, v.] Grown into a head like that of a cabbage.

cabb-bag ing, pr. par. & s. [CABBAGE, v.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As subst.: The act or process of forming a head like that of the cabbage.

"Cabbaging, among gardeners is sometimes used to denote the knitting and gathering of certain leaves into round bunched heads, in which case it amounts to the same with what lively calls penning pommer, and applying of growing applewise." —Home's Gardening.

cabb-ba-la, s. [CABALA.]

cabb ble, v.t. To break up into pieces. [CABBLING.]

cabb-bled, pa. par. & a. [CABBLE, v.]

cabb-bler, s. [CABBLE.] One who breaks up the iron in the process of cabbling.

cabb-bling, pr. par. & s. [CABBLE, v.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As substantive:

Metal.: A term among metallurgists in Gloucestershire, also called "scabbling." "Finery," that is the cast or pig iron, after it has been subjected to the influence of the refinery, is smelted with charcoal; it is then worked up with iron bars into a large ball of 2—2½ cwt., which is afterwards hammered into a flat oval from 2—4 inches thick; this is allowed to cool, and then the process of cabbling commences, which is simply breaking up this flat iron into small pieces. These pieces are again heated almost to fusion, hammered, and drawn out into bar-iron.

cabb-by, s. [CAB (1).] A cabman, one who drives a cab.

ca-bé ca, s. [Port.] The finest kind of India silk, as distinguished from the baricja, or inferior kind; calasse. (Simmonds.)

'ca-bel, s. [CABLE.]

ca-beld, pa. par. [CABLED.] (Scotch.)

cā-bēr, s. [CABIR.]

'1. A rafter, a joist.

2. A long pole. (Used specially in the game of tossing the caber.)

cą-bēr-ō-ą, s. [Etymology unknown.] A genus of Infundibulate Polyzoa (Bryozoa) of the sub-order Cheilostomata, and family Cabereadæ. There is but one British species, C. Boskeri.

cą bēr-ō'i dæ, s. pl. [Cabera (a); fem. pl. suff. -idæ.] A family of Infundibulate Polyzoa, distinguished by the unjointed polypides, the narrow branches, the cells in two or more rows, with vibracula (whips) or sessile avicularia at the back. There are two genera, one of which, Caberea, is British. (Griffith & Henfrey.)

cāb i-āl, s. [Brazilian cabiai.] Buffon's name for a South American mammal—the Capybara. (HYDROCHERUS, CAPYBARA.)

cāb-in, 'cab-an, 'cab ane, s. [Fr. cabane; Wel., Ir., & Gael. caban = a booth, cabin, dimin. of cab = a booth.]

1. A little hut or house; a small cottage.

Crope into a cabonge —P. Plowman, 1,788.

". . . on the south side of the ford were a few mud cabins, and a single house built of more solid materials." —Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi

2. Any temporary shelter or dwelling-place.

"Some of green boughs their slender cabins frame,
Some lodged were for them a streets about" —Fairfax.

"Who sees a soul in such a body set, Might love the treasure for the cabinet."
Ben Jonson.

"Young ladies and young gentlewomen too
Do no small kindness to my Pilgrim show:
Their cabinets their bosoms, and their hearts,
My Pilgrim has: cause he to them imparts
His pretty riddles in such wholesome strains."
Bunyan: P. P., pt. ii. Introd.

II. Technical:

1. A kind of deliberative committee or council of the Executive, consisting of the principal members of the Government. In the United States the Cabinet consists of a body of great officials appointed by the President as his advisers and assistants in the conduct of the government, and confirmed in their office by the Senate. They comprise the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Attorney General, and the Postmaster General. Each of these is the head of the Department indicated by his title, and as a collective body they act as an Advisory Board to the President. The United States system differs from the English in the fact that the Cabinet Ministers are not members of Congress, and that there is no Prime Minister, the President occupying the place of that official, and being responsible for the acts of the Government. The members of the Cabinet receive salaries of $8,000 per year. They are removable at the will of the President, but generally hold office till their successors are appointed and confirmed.

In England the Cabinet is differently constituted, being formed of members of Parliament of whom the Prime Minister, or Premier, is chosen by the Queen, and the others chosen by him. The Cabinet includes the First Lord of the Treasury, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord President of the Council, the Lord Privy Seal, the five Secretaries of State, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the First Lord of the Admiralty, eleven members in all. It has occasionally had others, to the number of seventeen. The English Cabinet grew out of the former Privy Council, the advisers of the Crown. This was a large body, and a smaller advisory body grew up within it, from which the present Cabinet emerged after the Revolution of 1688. The members are the leaders of the majority in the House of Commons, who are expected to leave office if defeated in any bill they have supported before the House. The only power at present possessed by the Sovereign is to appoint a new Premier, in which she has some, but not a wide, power of choice. The Premier, when appointed, becomes the responsible head of the Government, but one with a very uncertain tenure of office, as his position depends on his control of the vote of the House. The English Cabinet has grown out of the exigencies of the Government, and has no formal place in the constitution, while its functions are limited by no written rules. It is one of those expedients of which modern government is now so largely composed.

The acquisition of the actual governing power by the Premier and the loss of it by the sovereign, with the general suffrage of the people, assimilates Great Britain very closely to the Republican form of government.

The Cabinet has been adopted by other countries, such as France and Italy, under conditions closely similar to those of England. The Cabinet Ministers being members of the legislature, and expected to resign office when defeated in any measure. The elective head of the Government in France and the King in Italy, however, retain a power which has been lost by the Queen in England, the Cabinet standing to them in a position somewhat resembling that of the American Cabinet to the President.

"The cabinet council, shortly termed the cabinet, forms only part of the ministry or administration. . . . Its [the privy council's] duties of advising the crown and conducting the government of the country, are almost exclusively performed by the principal ministers of state, who form another section of it called the cabinet council. This is so termed on account of its being originally composed of such members of the privy council as the king placed most trust in, and conferred with, apart from others, in his cabinet or private room. Speaking constitutionally, however there is no difference between a cabinet and a privy councillor." —A. Fonblanque, Jun.: How we are Governed, let. 6

"Few things in our history are more curious than the origin and growth of the power now possessed by the cabinet. From an early period the kings of England had been assisted by a privy council, to which the law assigned many important functions and duties. During several centuries this body deliberated on the gravest and most delicate affairs of state. But by degrees its character changed. It became too large for despatch and secrecy. The rank of privy councillor was often bestowed as an honorary distinction on persons to whom nothing was confided, and whose opinion was never asked. The sovereign, on the most important occasions, resorted for advice to a small knot of leading ministers. The advantages and disadvantages of this course were early pointed out by Bacon, with his usual judgment and sagacity: but it was not till after the Restoration that the interior council began to attract general notice. During many years one reserved, politic cabinet continued to regard the cabinet as an unconstitutional and dangerous board." —Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

1. A meeting of the Cabinet for consultation.

"A Cabinet Council was hastily summoned [illegible] morning, and met at nine at the house of the Premier. —Morning Chronicle, Nov. 9, 1852.

A. As substantive:

I. Nautical, in Telegraphy, &c.:

1. A strong, thick rope, exceeding ten inches in circumference, originally only made of hemp, but now also of iron or copper wire, or most commonly of iron links. A rope less than ten inches in circumference is called a hawser.

¶ Hemp is laid up right-handed into yarns. Yarns are laid up left-handed into strands. Three strands are laid up right-handed into a hawser. Three hawsers laid up left-handed make a cable. The circumference of hemp rope varies from about 4 inches to 28. The strength of a hemp cable of 18 inches circumference is about 60 tons, and for other sizes the strength varies according to the cube of the diameter. Wire rope consists usually of three strands, laid or spun around a hempen core, while each of these strands consists of six wires laid the opposite way around a smaller hempen core. Hempen and wire ropes are usually employed for tow lines and for mooring purposes, but chain cables have now almost superseded those of hemp for anchoring purposes. These are made in links, each about six times the diameter of the iron employed, in length, and three and a half times in breadth. Compared with the strength of hemp cable, a one-inch diameter chain cable is equal to about 2½ hemp, and a 2 inch chain to an 8 inch hemp cable.

(1) The rope or chain to which a ship's anchor is attached. [CHAIN-CABLE.]

"Cable, or cabulle (cable?, or schyp roop, A. P.) Cercelle, &c.—Prompt. Parv.

'Cut then up the crossayl, cables they fasten.'
Alit. Portmotel Morte, Partenay, 168.

(2) The wire rope used for the support of some suspension bridges.

(3) The wire rope used for submarine telegraphs. Deep sea telegraph cables vary greatly in construction, so that no general description can be given. One laid in 1865 consisted of a core of seven copper wires, of which six were wound spirally around a central one. These were thoroughly surrounded with Chatterton's compound (a mixture of resin, Stockholm tar, and gutta percha). Over this four coatings of the compound and of gutta percha were alternately laid. Around this jute was carefully wrapped, and the whole was sheathed with ten iron wires, each of which was wrapped in strands of tarred manilla yarn. The total diameter was 1¼ inches, and the breaking strain 8 tons. "Shore end" cable has always an additional protection of wire and hemp. The cables which have subsequently been laid, and which are so numerous and extended as to bring almost all parts of the earth into telegraphic communication, vary from the above, as the result of experience, but the same care to produce complete insulation of the central conductor is taken.

2. A nautical measure of distance = 120 fathoms, or 720 feet, by which the distances of ships in a fleet are frequently estimated. This term is often misunderstood. In all marine charts a cable is deemed 607·56 feet, or one-tenth of a sea mile. In rope-making the cable varies from 100 to 115 fathoms; cablet, 120 fathoms; hawser-laid, 130 fathoms, as determined by the Admiralty in 1830. (Smyth.) According to Ure, a cable's length is 100 to 140 fathoms in the merchant service; in the Royal Navy four cables are employed, each of 100 fathoms, two cables being attached end to end.

II. In architecture:

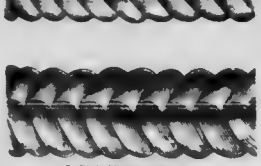
1. A wreathed or torus convex moulding made in the form of a rope. [CABLE-MOULDING.]



CABLE-MOULDING.

2. A moulding representing a cable or spiral scroll.

¶ Cable is used in many nautical phrases, e.g.:

1. A shot of cable: Two cables spliced together.

2. To bend the cable: To make it fast to the anchor.

3. To bit the cable: To fasten it round the bits. [BIT.]

4. To drag the cable: Said of a ship when the cable fails to hold it securely, owing to roughness of weather.

5. To feet the cable: To allow it to surge back on the whelps of the capstan or windlass, as the cable climbs on to the larger part of the cone.

6. To heckle the cable. [To serve the cable.] [CABLE (2), v.]

7. To pay out the cable: To let it run out.

8. To pay the cable cheap: To let it run out fast; to hand it out space.

9. To platt the cable: To serve it.

10. To serve the cable: To bind it round with ropes, canvas, &c., so as to prevent it from being galled in the hawser.

11. To slip the cable: To let it run out, and leave it, when there is no time to weigh anchor.

12. To splice the cable: To join the ends of two cables, or of a broken cable, by working the strands into one another. In the case of iron cables the splice is effected by means of shackles.

13. To veer the cable: To let more out.

14. To worm the cable: To fill the spiral crevices between the lays with strands.

B. As adjective: (See the compounds.)

¶ Compounds of obvious signification: Cable-length, cable maker.

cable-bends, s. pl. Two small ropes for lashing the end of a hempen cable to its own part, to secure the clinch by which it is fastened to the anchor-ring. (Smyth.)

cable-bit, s. [BIT.]

cable-bitted, a. So bitted as to enable the cable to be tripped or rendered with ease.

cable-buoy, s. A buoy or cask used to keep a rope cable to prevent it from being cut in rocky anchorages. Also used to support the end of a broken cable, to assist in recovering it.

cable-cane, s. A species of Palm, Calamus rudentum, a native of the East Indies, Cochin-china, &c.

cable car, s. A street railway car moved by a wire rope or cable, running in an iron conduit under the street. In the surface of this conduit is a slot, through which passes an iron arm fixed to the car, and gripping or releasing the cable at the will of the operator. The cable is moved by steam power at a central station. Cars of this kind have been introduced in a number of the cities of the United States as an acceptable substitute for horse cars, largely in San Francisco and Chicago, and to a less extent in Philadelphia and New York. The idea of using a rope or cable for this purpose is of old date, and various patents have been taken out, but it was first practically applied in 1873, by Mr. Hallidie, of San Francisco, on Clay Street of that city. This is a very steep street, with a rise of about one foot in six, and horse power was impracticable, but the method proved so successful that it was quickly applied to other streets, and San Francisco has now nearly 100 miles of cable road. It was adopted in Chicago about ten years later, and since then in some eastern cities. American engineers laid the first cable lines in Britain, they being opened in several cities and particularly in Edinburgh, where steep streets exist. In most places they will probably soon be superseded by electric trolley lines, which are coming widely into operation, but they are likely to be long retained in such cities as San Francisco and Edinburgh, whose steep gradients render them especially applicable.

cable-gripper, s.

Naut.: A lever compressor over the cable-well, by which the cable is stopped from running out.

cable-hatband, s. Twisted gold or silver cord worn as a hatband.

"... more cable till he had as much as my cable hatband to fence him."—Marston, Ant. & Mellida, ii. 1.

cable-hook, s.

Nautical:

1. A hook for attachment to the messenger by which the cable is hauled in on a man-of-war, or other ship having a large number of hands, without having recourse to the capstan. It may also be attached to a hawser, underrunning the cable.

2. A hook by which a cable is handled. Each seaman has a hook in lighting-up the cable or packing in tiers.

cable-laid, a. Twisted in the manner of a rope or cable, in which each strand is a hawser-laid rope.

cable-moulding, s. [CABLE, A. 2.]

cable-nipper, s.

Naut.: A device serving to bind the messenger to the cable, and composed of a number of rope-yarns or small stuff married together. (Knight.)

cable-rope, s.

Naut.: A thick strong rope, a cable.

cable-shackle, s.

Naut.: A D-shaped ring or clevis, by which one length of cable is connected to another, or, upon occasion, the cable connected to an object such as the anchoring. (Knight.) cable-sheet, sheet cable, s. The spare lower anchor of a ship.

cable stage, s. The place in the hold or cable-tier for coiling ropes and hawsers.

cable-stopper,

Naut.: A device to stop the paying-out of the cable.

cable-tier, s.

Nautical:

1. That part of the deck where the cables are stowed.

2. The coils of a cable.

1. Naut.: The coils of a cable.

2. Mech.: Any large rope used in raising weights, as in pulleys, cranes, etc.

3. Arch.: A moulding of a convex form at the back of the flutes, representing a rope or a staff laid in a flute.

4. Milit.: The large rope used in dragging guns.

cable-well, s.

Naut.: The part of the ship where the cable is coiled away.

cā'-ble, v.t. & i. [CABLE, s.]

I. Transitive:

1. Naut.: To fasten or secure with a cable. (Dyer: Pierce, ii.)

2. Arch.: To fill the flutes of columns with cable-moulding.

II. Telegraphy: To transmit (as news, &c.) by the submarine telegraph cable. Since the opening of the oceanic telegraph cables the price of messages over them has been greatly reduced, the total reduction having been from 5s. to 25 cents per word, though quite high rates continue to more distant points, as from England to Brazil, where it varies from 6s. 2d. in the north, to 1£, 8s. 10d. There are at present fourteen cables crossing the Atlantic, owned by six different companies, besides cables to numerous other parts of the world, and telegraphers are not without hope of being able to apply the telephonic system to ocean wires, and enable people to talk from continent to continent.

"Had Messrs. . . . . cabled the refusal of the order, or even written by return mail, there could have been no possibility of any misunderstanding."—Daily News, Sept. 13, 1873.

căc-ŏx'-ĕne, căc-ŏx'-ĕn-īte, s. [In Ger. kakoxen. From Gr. κακὸς (kakos) = bad, evil, ὀξὺς (oxus) = sharp, . . . pungent, acid. Cf. also κακοξενος (kakoxenos) = . . . inhospitable; suffix -ene; -ite (Min.) (q.v.).]

Min.: A mineral, supposed to be an iron-wavellite. It occurs in radiated tufts of a yellow or brownish-yellow colour, becoming brown on exposure, at the Arbeck mine in Bohemia. Compos.: Phosphoric acid, 9·20—25·71; sesquioxide of iron, 36·32—41·46; alumina, 0—10·01; lime, 0—1·1; silica, 0—8·90; hydrofluoric acid, 18·98—32·83. (Dana.) căc-tā'-ŏ-ē, s. pl. [Named from the Cactus (q.v.).]

Bot.: Indian Figs, an order of exogenous plants, placed by Lindley under his fifty-second alliance, the Cactales. The sepals and petals are numerous and confounded with each other. The stamens are indefinite, the ovary fleshy, inferior, one-celled; the fruit succulent, one-celled, many seeded. The flowers are sessile, GIANT CACTUS (Cereus giganteus).

and usually last only one day or night. The leaves are generally wanting, but an inexperienced observer might mistake for them the usually angular foliaceous stems. The Cactaceæ are natives of America, whence they have been imported into the warmer parts of the Eastern hemisphere. About 800 are known. The fruit of some species is refreshing and agreeable, that of others insipid. The juice of Mammillaria is slightly sickly, being at the same time sweet and insipid. Many of the Cactaceæ are of very abnormal forms.

căc-tā'-ŏ-ĕŏŭs, a. [Cactaceæ.] Pertaining to the Cactaceæ.

căc'-tăl, a. [Cactales.] Pertaining to group or order to which the Cactus plants belong.

căc-tā lēş, s. pl. [From Lat. cactus (q.v.), and pl. adj. suff. -ales.] Lindley's fifty-second alliance of plants. It stands between Myrtales and Grossales, and belongs to the fourth subclass, or Epigynous Exogens.

căc'-tin, s. [Eng., &c. cactus; -in.]

Chem.: A red colouring matter extracted from the fruit of some Cactuses.

căc'-tŭs, s. [Lat. cactus; Gr. κακτὸς (kaktos) = a prickly plant.]

Bot.: An old and extensive genus of Linnæus, in four sections:—(1) The Echinomelocacti; (2 & 3) Cerei of two kinds; and (4) Opuntiæ. It is now broken up into a number of genera. It is still popularly used as the designation of nearly the whole of the Cactaceæ, to which order, moreover, it has given its name. Cacti are sometimes called Melon Thistles.

Hedgehog cactus: A designation of the genus Echinocactus.

Leaf cactus: The Epiphyllum.

Melon thistle cactus: The Melocactus.

Nipple cactus: The Mammillaria.

cactus-wren, s.

Ornith.: Couës' name for birds of the genus Campylorhynchus, from their frequenting and nesting in cactus-plants.

cād-mi-ūm, s. [From Lat. cadmia (Pliny); Gr. καδμεία (kadmeia), καδμία (kadmia) = calamine, an ore of zinc.]

Chem.: A diatomic metallic element, discovered in 1818; symbol, Cd; atomic weight, 112; sp. gr., 8·6; melting point, 315°, boils at 860°. Cadmium is a white, ductile, malleable metal. It scarcely tarnishes in the air; it burns when heated in the air, forming a brown oxide, CdO. It dissolves readily in nitric acid; it decomposes water at red heat. Its vapour density is 3·9 compared with air. Cadmium is found in some zinc ores; when these are distilled it rises in vapour before the zinc does so. It also occurs in the form of sulphide in greenockite. The oxide dissolves in acids, forming colourless salts. The oxide absorbs CO_2 readily, and is converted into a white insoluble carbonate. Cadmium sulphate, $CdSO_4.H_2O$, forms colourless monoclinic crystals easily soluble in water, and forms double sulphates with potassium and ammonium sulphates. Cadmium chloride, $CdCl_2$, is very soluble; it forms double salts. The bromide and iodide are also white soluble salts, used in photography. Cadmium sulphide, CdS, is a bright-yellow powder, in soluble in dilute HCl; it is obtained by passing H_2S through an acid solution of a cadmium salt; it is insoluble in ammonium sulphide, thus easily distinguished from sulphides of arsenic, antimony, or tin. Cadmium sulphide is used as a yellow pigment. Cadmium is readily detected by the properties of its sulphide. Ammonia gives a white precipitate, soluble in excess; sodium carbonate a white precipitate of carbonate of cadmium, insoluble in excess. Cadmium is easily separated from zinc by passing H_2S into their solution in HCl; the cadmium is precipitated as yellow sulphide, CdS. Cadmium can be separated from copper in analysis by dissolving their sulphides in nitric acid and adding ammonia in excess, filtering off oxides of other metals; then potassium cyanide is added till the precipitate first formed redissolves, then H_2S gas is passed through the liquid, from which it throws down the cadmium as sulphide.

Min.: The same as Greenockite (q.v.). Formerly called also Sulphuret of Cadmium.

cadmium-yellow, s. A pigment, consisting of cadmium sulphide. [Cadmium.]

cād'-ūk, cād'-dōūck, s. [Fr. caduc; Lat. caducus = falling; cado = to fall.] A casualty; forfeited or escheated property.

"As their service to his Majestie was faithfull and loyall, so his Majestie was liberall and bountifull, in advancing them to titles of honour; as also in bestowing on them cadouks and casualties, to inrich them more than others." &c.—Sanders: Hispael., pt. ii., p. 138.

Entom.: A subtribe of insects, order Hemipters. The species are generally bright-scarlet with black spots. One is found in Britain.

cæ-çil'-i-ę, cæ-çil'-i-æ, s. [Lat. cæcilia = a kind of lizard, probably the blindworm (q.v.); cæcus = blind.]

1. Zool.: A genus of serpent-shaped amphibians, the type of the family Cæcilidæ (q.v.).

2. Ichthy.: A name used by some authors for the fish more usually known by the name of the Acus. It is common in the Mediterranean, and is called by the Venetian fishermen Biscia, that is, Viper-fish.

cæ-çil'-i-æne, s. pl. [From Lat. cæcilia; Eng. pl. suff. -æ.]

Zool.: The English name for the family Cæcilidæ (q.v.).

cæ-çil-i'-i-dæ, s. pl. [From Mod. Lat. cæcilia (q.v.).]

Zool.: Cæcilians, serpent-shaped amphibians. They belong to the order Gymnophiona. The young have internal branchiæ, while the adults breathe by lungs. None have been found fossil.

* cæ'-çit-æ, s. [Lat. cæcitas = blindness, from cæcus = blind.]

Med.: Blindness.

cæ-çī'-tis, s. [Mod. Lat. cæcum (q.v.); suff. -itis, denoting inflammation.]

Med.: Inflammation of the cæcum; typhlitis.

cæ'-cŭm, s. [Neut. of Lat. cæcus = blind, invisible.]

1. Anat.: The beginning of the great gut, commonly called the blind-gut, because it is perforated at one end only; it is the first of the three portions into which the intestines are divided.

2. Zool. & Paleont.: A genus of molluscs, by some considered to be the type of a family Cæcidæ, but generally placed under the family Turritellidæ. The species are recent or tertiary, commencing in the Eocene period.

cæ'-lŭm, s. [Lat. cælum = a chisel or burin of a sculptor or engraver, a graver; from cædo = to fall, . . . to cut.]

Cælum sculptoris: The sculptor's tool.

Astron.: One of Lacaille's constellations. It is not visible in England.

cæ-nănth'-i-ŭm, s. [See def.] An incorrect form of œnanthium (q.v.).

cæ'-ær, in compos. [Wel. = a wall, a fort, a city.] A town, a city, as Cærleon.

cæ'-rĕ-bę, s. [Etymology doubtful. Agassiz calls it "a barbarous word."]

Ornith.: A genus of birds, the typical one of the sub-family Cærebinæ (q.v.).

cær-ē-bi'-næ, s. pl. [From Mod. Lat. cæreba (q.v.), and fem. pl. suff. -inæ.] Ornith.: A sub-family of the Promeropidæ, or Sun-birds. It contains the Guitguits, the American representatives of the Sun-birds of the Old World.

* cær'-ŭle, * cær'-ule, a. [From Lat. cærulus = azure blue.] Azure blue. [Cerulean.]

"Whose cærule streams, rumbling in Pible stone."
Spenser: Virgil's Gnat

* cær-ŭ-lēs'-çĕnt, cer-ŭ-lēs'-çĕnt, a. [Formed by analogy as if from a Lat. cærulescens, from cærulus = azure blue; and Eng. suff. -escent.] Becoming more or less sky-blue.

cæs-al-pin'-i-ę, s. [Named after Andrea Cæsalpinus, chief physician to Pope Clement VIII., in the latter part of the sixteenth century.]

Bot.: The typical genus of the leguminous sub-order Cæsalpiniæ (q.v.). They are trees or shrubs, with showy yellow flowers, ten stamina, and bipinnatifid leaves. About fifty species are known. The intensely astringent Cæsalpinia coriaria has legumes which contain so much tannin that they are valuable for tanning purposes. They are known in commerce as Dividivi, Libidivi, or Libidibi, and come from the West Indies and South America. C. crista, also West Indian, C. sappan, from Brazil, and other species, produce valuable red, orange, and peach blossom dyes. The wood of the latter, given in powder, is tonic. C. brasiliensis, which, however, is not from Brazil, and is now called Pœppigia Linnæi, is said to produce the Brazil-wood of commerce. [Brazil-wood.] C. Sappan, from India, furnishes the Sappan-wood [Bukkum-wood, Sappan-wood.] An oil is expressed from the seeds of C. oleosperma and other species. The roots of C. Nuga and C. Mauritiana are diuretic; the seeds of C. Bonducella are intensely bitter. Several Chinese species have soap-pods, that is, pods which may be used as a substitute for soap. (Lindley, Treas. of Bot., &c.)

çæs-săl-pin'-i-ĕ'-æ, s. pl. [From Mod. Lat. Cæsalpinia (q.v.); pl. fem. adjectival suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: One of the great sub-orders into which the Leguminosæ are divided. They have an irregular flower, but not at all so much so as the Papilionaceæ. The petals are spreading, the stamens adhere to the calyx. They are mostly ten in number, though in rare cases less than five. They have purgative qualities. Though none are wild in Europe, they constitute a notable and attractive feature of the vegetation in India and other tropical countries. Lindley divides them into eight tribes—(1) Leptoloblæe, (2) Eucæsalpiniæ, (3) Cassieæ, (4) Swartzieæ, (5) Amherstieæ, (6) Bauhinieæ, (7) Cynometreæ, (8) Dimorphandreæ.

Çæs-ăr'-i-ăn (1), a. [From Lat. Cæsarius = pertaining to Cæsar, i.e., specially to Caius Julius Cæsar.] Pertaining to any of the Cæsars, and especially to the great Caius Julius Cæsar.

çæs'-ăr-i-ăn (2), çĕ-sār'-i-ăn, a. [From Lat. cæsura = a cutting, an incision, or possibly the same as (1); see def.] Involving the act of cutting, specially in the operation described under the compound terms.

Surgery & Midwifery: The most serious operation in midwifery, and only resorted to in extreme cases, to save life, as, for example, when a woman fully pregnant dies suddenly by accident or otherwise, the child being still alive in utero; or when, by reason of deformity, the birth cannot take place naturally nor with the aid of ordinary obstetrical instruments per naturales vias. The operation consists in making an incision in the abdomen and removing the child with the contents of the womb en masse, and then sewing up the wound thus made in the usual way. As might be expected, the danger to life from this operation is very great in those cases where the living mother is operated upon. Certain cases, however, have survived the operation—some have even gone through a repetition of it, and the proportion of these cases is increasing owing to the improvements in modern surgery. The Cæsarian operation was known to the Greeks. The Romans also practised it, and it was considered by them a fortunate circumstance to be so born. According to Pliny, Scipio Africanus was delivered in this way (Cæsi matris uteris sicut Scipio Africanus). This author, with others, also asserts that the name of Cæsar, afterwards Cæsar was first given to those thus born (quasi ex matris utero in lucem prolatus).

çæs'-ăr-işm, s. [Eng., &c. Cæsar, -ism.] Cæsarian (1); Despotic government; Imperialism.

çæs'-ĕl-ę, s. [In honour of Federico Cesi, an Italian naturalist.]

Bot.: A genus of lilaceous plants, belonging to the order Anthericeæ.

cæ-si-ā, s. [Named after Frederico Cæsio.]

Ichthyol.: A genus of acanthopterygious fusiform fishes, having the dorsal and anal spines much larger than the others, and their base thickly covered with small scales. Family, Chætodontidæ.

cæ-si-ous, a. [Lat. cæsius = bluish-grey. (Used generally of the eyes.)]

Bot.: Bluish-grey, lavender-colour. Akin to glaucous, but greener. (Lindley.)

cæ-si-um, s. [From Lat. cæsius = bluish grey, sky-coloured.]

Chem.: A monad metallic element; symbol Cs, at. weight 133. It was discovered in 1860 by spectrum analysis in mineral waters and in several minerals, as mica, felspar, &c., also in the ashes of plants. It is separated by the greater insolubility of the double chlorides with platinum. The hydrate is a strong base. Cæsium carbonate can be separated from rubidium carbonate by its solubility in absolute alcohol. Cæsium gives characteristic blue lines in its spectrum.

cæs-pit-ōse, a. [From Mod. Lat. cæspitosus; Class. Lat. cæspes (genit. cæspitis) = a turf, a sod.]

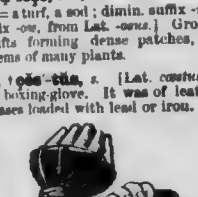
Bot.: Growing in tufts.

cæs-pit-u-lōse, a. [From Lat. cæspes (genit. cæspitis) = a turf, a sod; dimin. suffix -ul; and Eng. suffix -ose, from Lat. -osus.] Growing in small tufts forming dense patches, as the young stems of many plants.

cæs-tus, † cēs-tus, s. [Lat. cæstus = cestus.] A boxing-glove. It was of leather, in certain cases loaded with lead or iron.



CÆSTUS

"The prizes next are order'd to the field.
For the bold champions who the cæstus wield."
Pope: Homer's Iliad, xxiii. 753-4.

cæ-sū-li-ę, s. [Lat. cæsus = beaten.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, consisting of a single species, C. axillaris, a native of India. It is a small weed, growing in moist places, and has purple or white florets.

cæ-sūr-a, cæ-sur-æ, * cæs-ūre, * cēs-ure, s. [In Fr. cesure; Sp. & Ital. cesura; Lat. cæsura = a cutting off, from cædo = to cause to fall, to fall, to cut.]

* I. Ord. Lang.: Of the forms cesure and

"Vulgar languages that want Words and sweetnesse, and be scant
Of true measure
Tyran rime hath so abused,
That they long since haue refused
Other cesurre."
B. Jonson: A Fit of Rime against Rime.

"And I beyond measure,
Am ravish'd with pleasure,
To answer each cesaure."
Drayton: Third Nymphal.

II. Prosody: A pause in a verse. If in all cases such a rest for the breath occurred only at the termination of the several words, a painful sense of monotony would be experienced; hence the cæsura, as a rule, cuts off the last syllable from a word, and on the syllable so separated the stress is laid. In the line—

"Armâ vi- rumquê cá | nō Trō | jæ quî | primûs ăb | ōrīs," so is the cæsura.

In the following lines from Milton's Paradise Lost, bk. ii.—

"Hell and Hades, and the dread, dread name
Of Demogorgon; Rumour next and Chance,
And Tumult and Confusion all embroil'd,
And Discord with a thousand various mouths"

the com, mult, and cord are the chief cæsuras.

cæ-sur-ed, a. [From Lat. cæsura, and Eng. suff. -ed.] Pronounced with a cæsura, slowly drawled.

"No accents are so pleasant now as those,
That are cæsured through the pastor's nose."
Bromo: A Satire on the Rebellion.

cæ-sūr-al, cē-sūr-al, a. [From Lat. cæsura (q.v.), and Eng. suff. -al.] Pertaining to a cæsura, produced by a cæsura.

cæ-tĕr-is pār-i-bŭs, used as adv. [Lat.]

Logic & Ord. Lang.: Other things being equal.

"These characters are all cæteris paribus, in an inverse relation to one another."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. i., ch. 7, p. 190.

* caf, * cof, * kof, * kafe, a. [A.S. ceaf] Quick, eager. (Rel. Antiq., i. 212.) (Stratmann.) cā f-ē, s. [Fr. café = (1) a coffee-bean, (2) the tree which produces it, (3) the beverage formed from it, (4) a coffee-house.] A coffee-house.

* cāff, * cāffe, s. [Chaff.] (Scotch.)

"As wheitt unstable, and caffe before the wind,
And as the wood consumed is with fire—
Mikyke persew thesn with thy grieuous ire."
Poems, 16th Century, p. 96.

"The cleanest corn that e'er was dight May hae some pyles o' caff in."
Burns: Address to the Unco Guid.

cāf'-fa, s. [Native name.]

Fabrics: A kind of painted cloth goods manufactured in India.

cāf-fē'-ic, a. [Fr. café; and Eng. suffix -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from coffee, as caffeic acid.

cāf'-fē-ine, s. [From Fr. café = coffee; and Eng. suffix -ine.]

Chem.: $C_8H_{10}N_4O_2$. The same as Theine (q.v.). A feeble organic base occurring in tea, coffee, and the leaves of Guarana officinalis and Ilex paraguensis. A decoction of tea is mixed with excess of basic lead acetate, filtered, then H_2S is passed in to precipitate the excess of lead, filtered, evaporated, then neutralised by ammonia; the caffeine crystallises out on cooling. It forms tufts of white silky needles; it has a bitter taste; it forms double salts with platinum and gold chlorides. It is a methyl substitution compound of theobromine.

cā f fĕr, s. [Caffre.]

caffer-bread, caffir-bread, s. A name given in South Africa to various Cycadaceous trees, of the genus Encephelartos; the pith of the trunk and cones of which are used as bread by the Caffres. (Lindley, &c.) cāf fre, kāf-fre, cāf-fer, a. & s. [From Arab. kafir = infidel, i.e., not Mohammedan.]

calamus scriptorius, s. [Lat. scriptorius = pertaining to writing, or a writer; scribo = to write.]

Anat.: A canal at the bottom of the fourth ventricle of the brain, so called from its resemblance to the calamus scriptorius, or pen of the ancients.

† cą-lan'-dō, pr. par. [Ital. calando, pr. par. of calare = to decrease, lower.]

Music: Gradually diminishing in loudness and rapidity; becoming softer and slower.

cą-lăn'-drą, s. [Ital. calandra; Fr. calandre; Sp. calandria; Low Lat. calandra, Gr. κανδρα (kalandra) = a kind of lark.]

1. Ornith.: A species of lark, Melanocorypha calandra, with a thick bill, the upper part of the body of a reddish brown spotted with black. It is larger than the skylark.

2. Entom.: A genus of coleopterous insects of the family Rhynchophora, one species of which, C. granaria, the corn-weevil. The larva state, is very destructive to corn. Another species, C. oryzæ, attacks rice.

cą-lăn'-drĕ, cą-lăn'-dĕr, s. [Calandra.]

cą-lăn-drĭn'-ĭ-ą, s. [Named in honour of J. C. Calandrini.]

Bot.: A genus of South American plants belonging to the order Portulaceæ. They are chiefly natives of California and South America.

cą-lăn'-drŏŭs, s. [Ital. calare = a wood-lark.]

Music: A small reed instrument of the shawm or clarinet character, with two holes.

much used by the Italian peasantry. (Stainer & Barrett.)

ca-lăn-gay, s. [Etym. unknown; probably a native name.] A species of white parrot from the Philippine Islands.

cal-ange, *cal-an-gy, v. [CHALLENGE.]

cal-an-thē, s. [Gr. kalós (kalos) = beautiful; ánthos (anthos) = a flower.]

Bot.: A genus of herbaceous orchids the type of the order Calanthideæ. They are natives of the East Indies and Madagascar; a few are American. About thirty species are known. The flowers are white, lilac, purple, or copper-coloured.

ca-lăn-thid-ē-æ, s. pl. [Calanthe; and fem. pl. suff. -ideæ.]

Bot.: A family of orchideous plants.

ca-lăp-pa, s. [Etymology doubtful.]

Zool.: A Fabrician genus of decapod Crustaceans. Tribe, Brachyura. C. granulata and C. depressa are known as box-crabs.

cal-ash, * cā-lē-che, s. [Fr. calèche; Ger. kalesche, from Russ. koliaska = a calash carriage.]

1. A light pleasure or travelling carriage, with low wheels, having a top or hood removable at pleasure.

CALASH.

"Daniel, a sprightly swain, that used to slash
The vig'rous steeds that drew his lord's calash."
King

"The ancients used calashes, the figures of several of them being to be seen on ancient monuments. They are very simple, light, and drove by the traveller himself."—Archæological on Coins.

2. The hood of a carriage

*3. A hood for a lady's head, made of silk, supported with hoops of cane or whalebone, and projecting considerably over the face. (Latham.)

CALASH.

Vehicles: A folding leather top, with bows and joints; sometimes called a half-head.

ca-là-ta, s. [Ital.] An Italian dance in two-fourths time, of a sprightly character. (Stainer & Barrett.)

ca-lă-thē-a, s. [Gr. kálathos (kalathos) = a basket, from their being woven in baskets (Craig), or from the form of the stigma (Loudon.)]

Bot.: A genus of plants belonging to the order Marantaceæ, the Cannæ of Jussieu. The species are natives of tropical America, and several are in cultivation for the sake of their handsome foliage ca-lăth-i-an, a. [Lat. calathiana = the blue violet.] A term used only in the subjoined compound.

calathian violet, s.

Bot.: A plant so called (Gentiana pneumonanthe), native, though rare.

"It is called Viola autumnalis, or autumnal violet, and seemeth to be the same that Valerius Cordus calleth Pneumonanthe, which he says is named in the German tongue Lungen Blumen, or lung flowre, in English Autumn Bellflowre, Calathian Violets, and of some Harvest-bels."—Gerarde: Herball, p. 488, ed 1633.

cal-a-thi-d-i-ūm, ca-lă-thi-ūm, s. [Gr. kálathos (kalathus) = a basket.]

Bot.: A name given by some continental botanists to an umbel, in which all the flowers are sessile. (Craig.)

ca-lăth-i-form, a. [Lat. calathus; Gr. kálathos (kalathus) = a basket.]

Bot.: Having the form of a basket; basket-shaped, cup-shaped.

căl-a-thō-dēs, s. [Gr. kálathos (kalathos) = a basket; eídos (eidos) = appearance, likeness.]

Bot.: A genus of Ranunculaceæ, comprising a single species, Calathodes palmata, from Sikkim. It is a perennial herb, with large terminal and solitary flowers; petals none.

căl-a-thūs, s. [Lat. calathus; Gr. kálathos (kalathos) = a basket.]

*1. A kind of hand-basket, made of light wood or rushes. Used by women sometimes to gather flowers, but chiefly, after the example of Minerva, to put their work in. It was narrow at the bottom and widening upwards.

2. Entom.: A genus of coleopterous insects of the tribe Carabidæ. Seven species are British.

ca-lā-v-ēr-ite, s. [From Calaveras, where it is found.]

Min.: A new tellurid of gold, from the Stanislaus mine, Calaveras Co., California. It occurs massive without crystalline structure; colour, bronze yellow; streak, yellowish gray; brittle. Compos.: Tellurium 55·53, gold 44·47.

căl-ca-dis, s. [Arab.]

Med.: A name given by the Arabs to white vitriol or to some white vitriolic mineral.

căl-căire, s. [Fr., as a. = calcareous, limy; as s. = a calcareous rock.]

Geol.: A word used in this country only in the two subjoined terms.

calcaire grossier, s. [Fr. grossier = thick, coarse.]

Geol.: A rock or stratum consisting of a coarse limestone often passing into sand. It occurs in the Paris basin, and is used as a building stone. It is of Middle Eocene age. It abounds in shells, especially species of Cerithium. In other parts there is Miliolite Limestone, consisting of millions of microscopic foraminifera. (Lyell.)

calcaire siliceux, s. [Fr. siliceux = siliceous, flinty.]

Geol.: A compact siliceous limestone associated with the Calcaire Grossier, and coeval with it.

căl-căn-ē-al, a. [From Mod. Lat. calcaneum (q.v.), and Eng. suffix -al.] Pertaining to the calcaneum or bone of the heel.

căl-ca-ne-ŭm, s. [From Lat. calx (genit. calcis).]

Anat.: The bone of the tarsus which forms the prominence of the heel or the hock. (Huxley.)

căl-car (1), s. [Lat. calcaria = a lime-kiln; calcarius = pertaining to lime; calx (genit. calcis) = lime.]

1. Glass-making: A name given to a small furnace in which the first calcination is made of sand and potash, for the formation of a frit, from which glass is made. [FRITTING-FURNACE.] (Ure.)

2. Metal.: An annealing arch or oven. (Knight.)

căl-car (2), s. [Lat. calcar = a spur; from calx (gen. calcis) = the heel.]

Bot.: A spur, a projecting hollow or solid process, from the base of an organ, as in the flowers of Larkspur and Snapdragon; such flowers are called calcarate, or spurred. (Used also in a similar sense in anatomy.)

căl-car ate, a. [Calcar (2); -ate.]

Bot.: Spurred. For definition see CALCAR (2), s.]

"By the irregular development of one or more sepals the spurred tetracerate calyx of Larkspur and of Indian Cress is produced."—Bat. sur Reading, p. 202.

căl căr'-ē-æ, s. pl. [Lat. calcaria, nom. pl. of a. calcarius = pertaining to lime.]

Zool.: The same as CALCISPONGIÆ (q.v.).

căl-căr'-ē-ō, only in compos. [Eng. calcare-ous] (q.v.).]

Min.: Consisting of or containing calcareous and argillaceous earths.

calcareo-barite, s.

Min.: A white barite from Strontian, in Argyleshire, containing, probably as mixture, 6·6 per cent. of lime and some silica and alumina

Min.: Consisting of or containing calcareous and bituminous earths.

Min.: Consisting of or containing calcareous and silicious earths.

Min.: Consisting of or containing calcareous and sulphurous earths.

căl-căr'-ē-ŭs, a. [Lat. calcarius = pertaining to lime; calx (genit. calcis) = lime.]

1. Min.: Consisting of or containing carbonate of lime; of the nature of limestone.

2. Geol.: Calcareous rocks are generally of animal origin. They consist of fragments of shells, corals, encrinites, or of globigerinæ, and other foraminifera. Even when so wholly crystalline that no traces of old organisms can be detected, there is reason to believe that these previously existed and have been destroyed by metamorphic action.

calcareous barytes, s.

Min.: A variety of barytes, with an abnormal quantity of carbonate of lime in its composition.

calcareous earth, s. [In Fr. terre calcaire; Ger. kalkerde.] A term commonly applied to lime in any form, but properly to pure lime. It is also frequently applied to marl, and to earths containing a considerable proportion of lime.

calcareous marl, s.

Min.: A soft, earthy deposit, often hardly at all consolidated with or without distinct fragments of shells; it generally contains much clay, and graduates into a calcareous clay. (Dana.) calcareous spar, s.

Min.: Calcite, crystallized native carbonate of lime, of which there are many varieties. The usual composition is carbonic acid 44·0, lime 56·0, but it often contains impurities, upon which depend the colours assumed by the crystal. Carbonates of lime are widely distributed in nature, as marbles, chalk, &c. [ICELAND-SPAR, MARBLE.]

calcareous sponges, s.pl. An order of sponges—the Calcispongiæ (q.v.).

calcareous tufa, s.

Min.: A term applied to varieties of carbonates of lime, formed by evaporation of water containing that mineral in solution, occurring in fissures and caves in limestone rocks, and near springs, the water of which is impregnated with lime.

căl-căr'-ē-ŭs-nĕss, s. [Eng. calcareous; -ness.] The quality of being calcareous, or partaking of the nature of limestone.

căl-car-if-ēr-oŭs, a. [Lat. calcaria = a lime-kiln; fero = to bear.] Producing lime, calciferous.

căl-căr-i-form, a. [Lat. calcar = spur; forma = form, appearance.]

Bot.: Shaped like a calcar, or spur; spur-shaped.

căl-car-ī'-na, s. [Lat. calcar = a spur; neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.] One of the Rotaline Foraminifera. It is coated with exogenous shell growth, as granules, spines, &c. Shell thick. Common in several tertiary strata, and living abundantly in the Mediterranean and other warm seas. (Griffith & Henfrey.) căl-ca-văl-la, s. [Port.] A kind of superior sweet wine from Portugal

 căl-çē-ā'-tĕd, a. [Lat. calceatus, pa. par. of calceo = to shoe; calceus = a shoe.] Furnished with shoes, shod calçed, a. [Lat. calceatus = shod.]

1. Gen.: Wearing shoes or boots, not sandals.

2. Spec.: Pertaining or belonging to that branch of the Carmelite Order which did not accept the reform of St. Teresa. [Discalced.]

"Subject to the Father-General of the calced Carmelites."—Miss Lockhart: Life of St. Teresa, Note Ch.

 căl-çē-dŏn, s. [CALCEDONY.] A foul vein like calcedony in some precious stones. (Ash.) cal-çe-dŏn ic, cal-çe-dŏ'-ni-çus, a. [Lat. calcedonius = a calcedony.] Pertaining to, or of the nature of, calcedony.

* cal-çe'-dŏn-y, s. [Chalcedony.]

căl-çē'-i-form, a. [Lat. calceus = a shoe; forma = form, shape.]

Bot.: The same as Calceolate (q.v.).

căl-çē'-ō la, s. [Lat. calceolus = a little shoe or slipper; calceus = a shoe.]

Zool.: A genus of brachiopod mollusca, of the family Orthidæ, the bivalve shell of which is somewhat slipper-shaped. It is fossil only, being found in the Devonian rocks.

căl-çē-ō-lā'-ri-ŭs, s. [Lat. calceolarius = a shoemaker, from calceolus = a little shoe, a slipper; calceus = a shoe.]

1. Bot. & Hortic.: A well-known and beautiful genus of plants—order Scrophulariaceæ. The resemblance to a shoe is in the bilabiate corolla of the best-known species, the elongated lower lip of which is inflated and turned down. The stamens are only two. The species, which are numerous, come from South America, chiefly from the western slope or side of the Andes. The greater number have yellow flowers, others are purple, whilst in a few the two colours are intermingled. The roots of Calceolaria arachnoidea are collected in Chili, where they are called relbun, and are used for dyeing woollen cloth crimson. Various calceolarias are cultivated in this country.

căl-çē'-ō-late, a. [Lat. calceolus = a little shoe, a slipper, and Eng. suff. -ate.]

Bot.: Having the form of a shoe or slipper. Examples, the petals of the orchid Cypripedium and the Calceolaria, or Slipper-plant.

cal'-çēş, călx'-ēş, s. pl. [Calx.]

cal'-çic, a. [From Lat. calx (genit. calcis) = lime, and Eng. suffix -ic.] Pertaining to or composed in whole or in part of lime, as calcic carbonate, calcic oxide.

cal-çif'-ĕr-ŏŭs, a. [Lat. calx (genit. calcis) = lime, chalk; fero = to bear.]

Min.: Containing or producing calcite or carbonate of lime.

cal-çif'-ic, a. [Eng. calcif(y); -ic.] Calciferous, calcific. (Huxley: Physiol., ch. 12.)

† cal-çif-i-cā'-tion, s. [Lat. calx (genit. calcis) = lime; fucio = to make.] The process of being converted into a stony substance containing lime.

". . . and it seems probable that the solid mass of fully formed bone is formed by the calcification of this tissue."—Carpenter: Principles of Physiology, p. 908.

cal'-çi-fied, pa. par. or a. [Calcify.]

"Calcified teeth are peculiar to the vertebrates, and may be defined as bodies primarily, if not permanently, distinct from the skeleton, consisting of a cellular and tubular basis of animal matter containing earthy particles, a fluid, and a vascular pulp."—Owen: Anat. of Vertebrates.

† cal'-çi-form, a. [Lat. calx (genit. calcis) = lime; forma = form, appearance.] In the form of chalk or lime.

cal çi-fy, v.t. [Lat. calx (genit. calcis) = lime; ficio (pass. fio) = to make.] To convert into lime.

"Were this sheath actually dentinal in tissue and united to the jaw bone, the resemblance to the Lepidosiren would be closer, but it is never calcified, and is shed during the progress of the metamorphosis."—Owen: Anat. of Vertebrates.

cal'-çi-măn-gite, s. [From Lat. calcium; Eng. manganese; and suff. -ite (Min.) (q.v.).]

Min.: The same as Spartaite (q.v.).

* cal'-çi-mine, s. [Lat. calx (genit. calcis) = lime.] A superior kind of white or coloured wash for walls. (Webster.)

* cal'-çi-mine, v.t. [Calcimine, s.] To wash over with calcimine; as, "to calcimine walls." (Hart.)

† cal'-çi-nā-ble, a. [Eng. calcin(e); -able.] Capable of being calcined; that may be calcined.

"Not fermenting with acids, and imperfectly calcinable in a great fire."—Hill: Fossils, &c. Granite

* cal'-çin-ate, v.t. [Low Lat. calcinatus, pa. par. of calcino = to calcine.] To calcine.

". . . first, it indurateth, then maketh fragile, and lastly it doth calcinate."—Bacon: Nat. Hist.

cal-çin-ā'-tion, * cal-ci-na-ci-ŏun, s. [Low Lat. calcinatus, pa. par. of calcino = to calcine.]

1. The operation of expelling from a substance by heat, either water or volatile water combined with it. Thus, the process of burning lime, to expel the carbonic acid, is one of calcination. The result of exposing the carbonate of magnesia to heat, and the removal of its carbonic acid, is the production of calcined magnesia. The term was, by the earlier chemists, applied only when the substance exposed to heat was reduced to a calx, or to a friable powder, this being frequently the oxide of a metal. It is now, however, used when any body is subjected even to a process of wasting. (Ure.) Marble, limestone, and chalk, which are all carbonates of lime, are deprived of their carbonic acid and water by calcination. It also deprives copper and other ores of their sulphur, the sulphurets being oxidized and sulphuric acid being disengaged and volatilised. (Knight.)

"Ours fourneys eke of calcinacioun."
Chaucer: C. T., 12,733.

"Adustion causeth blackness and calcination whiteness."—Bacon: Works (ed. 1765), vol. i., ch. xi.

2. The operation of reducing a metal to an oxide; oxidation.

* 3. The result of the process of calcining.

calcination-pot, s. A sort of crucible used for preparing animal charcoal.

† cal'-çi-na-tŏr-y, s. [Low Lat. calcinatorium.] A vessel or crucible used in calcination.

cal'-çine, v.t. & i. [Fr. calciner; Low Lat. calcino; Lat. calx (genit. calcis) = chalk.]

A. Transitive:

I. Literally:

1. To reduce to a powder.

"Moses, with an actual fire calcined, or burnt the golden calf unto powder."—Sir T. Browne: Relig. Medici.

"The turf being, as it were, calcined by the scorching hoofs of their diabolical partners."—Scott: Black Dwarf, ch. ii.

2. To reduce a metal to an oxide; to oxidize.

* 3. To utterly consume.

"This earth at last shall be calcined."
H. More: Enthus. Triumph.

* II. Figuratively: To consume.

"You by a chaste chimicke Art, Calcine frailе love to pietie."
Habington: Castara.

B. Intransitive: To be reduced to a powder; to become calcined.

". . . in a very strong heat, calcining without fusion."—Newton: Opticks.

cal'-çined, pa. par. & a. [Calcine, v.]

1. Reduced to a powder.

"Antimony calcined or reduced to ashes."—Browne: Vulgar Errours.

2. Oxidized.

"When a decoction of meat is effectually screened from ordinary air, and supplied solely with calcined air, putrefaction never sets in."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science, 3rd ed., p. 303.

† cal'-çi-nĕr, s. [Calcine.]

1. Gen.: One who, or that which, calcines.

2. Spec.: A calcining or roasting furnace.

A. & B. As pr. par. and partic. adj.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

C. As substantive: The act of reducing to a powder; calcination

"In amalgamynge and calcenynge."
Chaucer: C. T., 12,609.

calcining-furnace, s. A large reverberatory furnace, having a fire at one end, two chimneys at opposite corners, four doors at which the operation is observed, the rabbles introduced, and the material withdrawn, and hoppers above by which the ore is introduced. (Knight.)

cal-çi-nī'-trе, s. [Lat. calx (genit. calcis) = lime, and nitre (q.v.).]

Min.: The same as Nitrocalcite (q.v.)

* cal'-çin-ize, v.t. [Calcine.] To calcine. (Sylvester: Du Bartas.) cal-çi-ŏ-çĕ-lē'-stite, s. [Lat. calcius = pertaining to lime; calx (genit. calcis) = lime; cœlestis, cœlestis = heavenly, sky-blue; cœlum = heaven.]

Min.: A variety of Celestite (q.v.), containing a large proportion of lime.

cal-çi-ŏ-fĕr'-rite, s. [Lat. calcius = pertaining to lime; calx (gen. calcis) = lime; ferrum = iron; suff. -ite (Min.) (q.v.).]

Min.: A sulphur, yellow or yellow mineral from Battenberg in Bavaria. Sp. gr. ... 2·529. Compos.: Phosphor. acid, ... quloxide of iron, 24·84; alumina, ... nesia, 2·65; lime, 14·81; hydrogen, 20·5...

cal-çi-spŏn'-ġi-æ, s. pl. [From Lat. calx (genit. calcis) = lime, and spongia = a sponge.] [Sponge.]

Zool.: Calcareous sponges. One of the leading divisions of Spongida (sponges), the others being Keratoda (horny sponges), and Silicispongiæ (siliceous sponges), and Myxospongiæ (sponges with neither a horny nor a siliceous skeleton). The living species of calcareous sponges have a skeleton composed of spicula of lime, and are generally free and independent of each other.

cal-çi-spŏn'-ġi-an, s. [Calcispongiæ.] Any individual of the calcispongiæ, a chalk sponge.

cal'-çite, s. [Lat. calx (genit. calcis) = chalk and suff. -ite (q.v.).] Crystallised carbonate of lime. [Iceland-spar.]

cal-çi-trā'-pe, s. [Ital. calcitrippa = the star-thistle.] [Caltrop.]

Bot.: A name for the Star-thistle, Centaurea calcitrapa.

* cal'-çi-trāte, v.t. & i. [O. Fr. calcitrer, Lat. calcitro = to kick, from calx (genit. calcis) = a heel.] To kick, to spurn. (Cotgrave & Cockeram.)

* cal-çi-trā'-tion, s. [From Eng. calcitrate (q.v.), and suff. -ion.] The act of kicking.

"The birth of the child is caused partly by the calcitration, breaking the membranes in which it is."—Bacon: Arcana Microcosmi, 16·2, p. 82.

cal'-çi-ŭm, s. [From Lat. calx (genit. calcis) = lime.]

Chem.: A dyad metallic element. Symbol, Ca; atomic weight, 40; sp. gr., 1·57. Obtained by Davy by decomposing the chloride by electricity; also by heating the iodide with sodium in a closed vessel. Calcium is a brassy-yellow, ductile, malleable metal, which oxidises ... moist air; it decomposes water, and dissolves ... easily in dilute acids. Heated in the air, it ... at red heat, and burns with a bright orange light. Calcium occurs in nature chiefly as a carbonate, silicate, and sulphate. Calcium oxide, CaO, called also Lime, is obtained by heating the carbonate of calcium to redness. It is a white, earthy, infusible powder, phosphorescent at high temperatures. It is strongly alkaline, and readily absorbs carbonic anhydride. It unites vigorously with water, throwing out great heat, and forms a hydrate, $CaOH_2O$, which is slightly soluble in cold water, it is used in medicine as lime-water. Impure lime mixed with sand forms mortar.

Calcium sulphate, $CaSO_4$. Found as hydrate as gypsum, $CaSO_42H_2O$, and selenite and alabaster. The water is given off by heating it, and a white powder is left, which dissolves in 500 parts of cold water. Mixed with water, it sets in a hard substance; it is used under the name of plaster of Paris for making casts of medals and statues, &c.

Calcium carbonate, $CaCO_3$, forms the chief constituent of limestone, marble, chalk, &c. It occurs crystallised as calc-spar and arragonite. Calcium carbonate is insoluble in water, but is dissolved by water containing carbonic acid gas; it is deposited from the solution by boiling, hence in tufa deposits.

Calcium phosphates occur in the bones of animals and are native in Apatite. [Phosphates.]

Calcium chloride, $CaCl_2$, is obtained by dissolving the carbonate in hydrochloric acid. It crystallises in white prismatic crystals. It is very deliquescent. Fused calcium chloride is used to dry gases, &c. It absorbs ammoniacal ...

Calcium fluoride, CaF_2, occurs as fluor-spar.

Calcium sulphides and ... oxides have been obtained. Salts of calcium are not precipitated by H_2S, either in an acid or alkaline solution. Alkaline carbonates and ammonia carbonate give a white precipitate insoluble in excess; oxalate of ammonia gives a white precipitate from a neutral solution; the precipitate is not soluble in acetic acid. A solution of sulphate of calcium gives no precipitate. The chloride gives an orange-red flame with alcohol. The spectrum of calcium gives several characteristic lines, especially an orange-red and a green line. Chloride of lime, or bleaching powder, is a mixture of calcium chloride and calcium hypochlorite.

¶ Calcium Arseniate (Min.) is = Pharmacolite; Calcium Borosilicate = Datholite; Calcium Carbonate = (1) Calcite, (2) Aragonite; Calcium Columbate = (1) Microlite, (2) Azorite; Calcium Phosphate = Apatite; Calcium Silicate = (1) Wollastonite, (2) Okenite; Calcium Sulphate = Selenite; and Calcium Tungstate = Scheelite, all which see.

calcium-light, s. The Drummond or oxyhydrogen light, in which streams of oxygen and hydrogen are directed and inflamed upon a ball of lime whose incandescence gives a very vivid and brilliant light. [DRUMMOND-LIGHT.] (Knight.)

cal-civ-or-ous, a. [From Lat. calx (genit. calcis) = limestone, lime, and vorare = to devour.] Bot.: Eating into or corroding a limestone rock. (R. Brown, 1874.)

calc-u-lar-y, a. & s. [Lat. calculārius, from calculus = a little stone; calx = (1) lime, chalk; (2) a pebble.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining to or caused by the disease of stone in the bladder.

"Nelson was terribly ill and nervous to him, by reason of his calculary accidents and corpulency."—Sir. Haddon: Life of Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, p. 218.

B. As subst.: A mass of small stony lumps found in the pear and other fruits.

calc-u-late, v.t. & i. [Lat. calculatus, pa. par. of calculo = to reckon by means of pebbles; from calculus = a little stone, a pebble; dimin. of calx = (1) lime, chalk; (2) a stone, pebble. In Fr. calculer; Sp. calcular; Ital. calcolare.]

A. Transitive:

I. Literally:

1. To compute, to reckon up in number.

"If in calculations the numbers of the people, we take in the multitudes that emigrate to the plantations."—Graunt's Essays, x.

*2. To divine or prognosticate by the situation of the planets at a certain time.

"A cunning man did calculate my birth."
Shakesp.: 2 Hen. VI., iv. 1.

"Who were there then in the world, to observe the births of those first men, and calculate their nativities."—Bentley.

II. Figuratively: To arrange or adjust for a purpose. (Seldom used except in the pa. par.)

"I calculate my remedy for this nine individual kingdoms of Ireland."—Swift: Modest Proposal.

B. Intransitive:

1. To make calculations; prognosticate.

"Why all these fires, why all these gliding ghosts, Why old men fool and children calculate."
Shakesp.: Julius Cæsar, i. 3.

2. To form one's opinion on; to reckon or depend on; to expect. (Colloquial, and chiefly American.)

¶ Generally used with the prep. on before the matter on which the opinion is formed.

calc-u-lā-tĕd, pa. par. & a. [CALCULATE, v.]

"Cæsar . . . did not forth an excellent and perfect kalendar, more exactly calculated, than any other that was before."—North: Plutarch, p. 614.

calc-u-lā-ting (1), pr. par., a., & s. [CALCULATE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

"With his cool, calculating disposition, he easily got the better of his ardent rival."—Godwin: W. Leon.

C. As substantive: The act or process of computing, reckoning, or estimating.

calculating engine, s. The same as CALCULATING MACHINE (q.v.).

"Such are the facts which, by a certain adjustment of the calculating engine, would be presented to the observer."—Babbage: Ninth Bridgewater Treatise, ch. ii.

calculating machine, s. A machine for making arithmetical calculations with speed and accuracy. The simplest one is the abacus (q.v.). The best known of such machines is that which Babbage was employed by the British Government to construct. He began the work in 1821, and continued it for about twelve years, till 1833, at an expense of £15,000, after which it was abandoned. The part completed is preserved in the library of King's College. A modification of Babbage's invention is now in use at the Albany Observatory.

calc-u-lā-ting (2), a. [Lat. calculus = a stone, pebble.] Turning into, or forming into a calculus or stone in the bladder. (Tegmeil.)

calc-u-lā-ting-ly, adv. [Eng. calculating (1); -ly.] In the manner of one calculating; by way of calculation.

calc-u-lā-tion, s. [Lat. calculus = a small stone, a pebble, because pebbles were of old used in this country, as they still are among some uncivilised tribes, as aids in counting. Eng. suff. -ation.]

I. Literally:

1. The act of calculating, reckoning, or computing in numbers.

"One Bartholomew Scultet . . . hath by calculation found the very day."—Raleigh: Hist. of World, bk. iii., ch. 23.

"And, leaving it to others to foretell,
By calculation sage, the ebb and flow."
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vi.

2. The result of an arithmetical computation or reckoning.

"If we suppose our present calculation, the Phœnix now in nature will be the sixth from the creation."—Browne: Vulgar Errours.

II. Figuratively:

1. The act or process of estimating the force and result of circumstances.

2. The result of such estimation; the opinion formed of circumstances.

"The fate of the Triennial Bill confounded all the calculations of the best informed politicians of that time."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xx.

calc-u-lā-tive, a. [Formed by analogy of other adjectives from an imaginary Lat. calculativus; from calculus = a pebble, stone.] Pertaining to calculation; involving calculation.

"Persons bred in trade have in general a much better idea, by long habits of calculative dealings."—Burke: On the Poverty Laws.

calc-u-lā-tor, calk-ĕ-lā-tour, s. [Fr. calculateur; Lat. cucudator = one who reckons calculus = a pebble, stone.]

I. Ordinary Language (of persons):

1. One who reckons or computes by numbers; a computer.

*2. One who prognosticates by astrology.

". . . calculatours and astronomye."—Wycliffe: Select Works, p. 408.

3. One who estimates the force or effect of causes; one who calculates results.

"Ambition is no exact calculator. Avarice itself does not calculate strictly when it chuses."—Burke: On Shortening the Duration of Parliaments.

II. Technically (of things):

1. An arithmometer of a certain type. (See Knight: Pract. Dict. Mechan., i. 133, for a description and figure of it.)

2. A kind of orrery (q.v.) invented by Ferguson.

calc-u-lā-tor-y, a. [Lat. calculatorius = pertaining to calculation; calculus = a pebble, stone.] Pertaining to calculation.

"That other calculatory or figure-casting astrology."—Hall: Cases of Conscience.

calc-ūle, s. [Lat. calculus = a pebble used in counting.] Reckoning, computation, calculation.!

"The general calcule, which was made in the last pramunication, exceeded eight millions."—Secret Naval Papers.

calc-ŭle, cal-cu-len, cal kyll, cal kil, cal cle, v.t. [Fr. calculer; Lat. calculo = to calculate; from calculus = a pebble used in counting.] [CALCULATE.] To calculate, compute.

"Full suttilly he calculed all this."
Chaucer: Prol. Tale.

calc-ŭled, cal-kled, cal-kiled, pt. par. or a. [CALCULE, v.]

"Astronomyers al so aren at ere whittes end Of that was calculed of the clymat the contrarye calc'-u-li, s. pl. [CALCULUS.]

calc-u-ling, cal-ku-lyng, *kal-ku-lyng, pr. par., a., & s. [CALCULE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & partic. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive: The act of calculating; calculation.

"When this kalkas knew by calculynge."
Chaucer: Troilus, i. 71.

calc-u-lōse, calc-u-lous, a. [Lat. calculosus = full of pebbles or stones; calculus = a pebble, a stone.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Full of stones, stony, gritty.

"The feldes calculose, eke harde and drie."
Palladius, ii. 60.

2. Medicine:

(1) Affected with stone in the bladder; suffering from calculus.

"I have found, by opening the kidneys of a calculous person, that the stone is formed earlier than I have suggested."—Sharp.

(2) Of the nature of a calculus.

"The volatile salt of urine will coagulate spirits of wine: and thus, perhaps the stones or calculous concretions in the kidney or bladder, may be procured."—Browne: Vulgar Errours.

calc-u-lus, s. [In Fr. calcul; Sp. calculo; Port. calculaçno = the mathematical calculus; calculo = a calculus (in Med.); Ital. calcolo, or calculo; all from Lat. calculus = (1) a small stone or pebble, (2) a stone in the bladder, (3, 4, &c.) a stone used for voting or one for reckoning, &c.]

1. Among the old Romans: A stone used for voting. At trials white and black stones were thus employed, the white expressing a vote for acquittal and the black for condemnation.

2. Med.: The medical term for what is popularly known as stone. Calculi vary in size from a pin's head to a pigeon's egg, and even larger, and weigh from a few grains to several ounces. They derive their special name and character as well from the organs of the body in which they are found as from the constituents of which they are composed. Thus, for example, a calculus found in the kidney or ureter is called renal, in the bladder vesical, and so on; but, according to its chemical composition, it would also be called either (1) uric (lithic) acid calculus, or (2) oxalic (mulberry) calculus, or (3) phosphatic calculus. Calculi derived from the bile are also called in the gall-bladder, and in the biliary and intestinal ducts, where they receive the name of gall-stones, or biliary calculi. Those found in the salivary glands are called salivary calculi.

3. Math.: Any branch of mathematics which may involve or lead to calculation. In this sweeping sense it embraces the whole science, with the exception of pure geometry. Thus there may be a calculus of functions, a calculus of variations, &c., but the leading divisions of the subject are the Differential and the Integral Calculus.

Calculus of functions: The calculus in which what is sought is the form of a function, and not its value in any particular case, nor the condition under which it may have a particular value.

Calculus of variations: A method in which the laws of dependance, binding together variable quantities, are themselves subject to change

The Differential Calculus is a method of investigating mathematical questions by measuring the ratio of certain indefinitely small quantities called differentials. [DIFFERENTIAL.]

Imaginary Calculus: A method of investigating the nature of imaginary quantities required to fulfil apparently impossible conditions. The result proves that all absurdities in geometry may be ultimately resolved into attempts to measure a straight line in a direction different from that of its length.

The Integral Calculus reverses the process which obtains in the differential calculus, that is, it reasons out from the ratio of the indefinitely small changes of two or more magnitudes, the magnitudes themselves, or, as it is technically stated, from the differential of an algebraic expression it finds the expression itself. [INTEGRAL.]

 cāld, a. & s. [COLD.] (O. Eng. & Scotch.)

"Thy corpe in slot mot calder lende."
Rev. Eng. Allit. Poems: Penit., xxx.

cāl'-dēr-ą, s. [Sp.] A Spanish term for the deep caldron-like cavities which occur on the summits of extinct volcanoes. (Stormonth.) cāl'-dēr-īte, s. [Apparently from the proper name Calder, and suff. -ite (Min.) (q.v.).]

Min.: A doubtful mineral from Nepaul, said by Dana to be nothing but massive garnet. The British Museum Catalogue, however, recognises it as a variety of garnet.

cāld'-rife, a. [CAULDRIFE.] (Scotch.) cāl'-drŏn, caul'-drŏn, * can'-drŏn, s. [O. Fr. caldron, caudron, chaudron; from O. Fr. caldaru; Lat. caldaria = caldron; calidus = hot; from caleo = to be hot; Sp. calderon; Ital. calderone.] A large kettle or boiler.

"And he struck it into the pan, or kettle, or caldron, or pot; . . . ."—1 Sam. ii. 14.

"The limbs yet trembling in the caldrons boil."
Dryden: Virgil: Æneid i. 260.

 cāle (1), s. [KAIL, KALE.]

 cāle (2), s. [Etymology doubtful.] Some kind of serpent.

"A feeble worm, cales and manticoras."
King Alexander, 7,004.

cāl'-ē-ą, s. [Gr. καλός (kalos) = beautiful.]

Bot.: A genus of composite plants, containing upwards of thirty species, natives of Mexico and Brazil. They are herbs or small shrubs. C. zacatechichi, a Mexican species, is known there by the name of Juralillo, and is said to contain, in a fresh state, a considerable quantity of camphor. The leaves of C. jamaicensis are said to be powerfully bitter, and steeped in wine or brandy are used as a stomachic in the West Indies. (Treas. of Bot.)

cāl-ē-ē'-ną, s. [Gr. καλός (kalos) = beautiful.]

Bot.: A name applied to a few brown-coloured terrestrial orchids, natives of New Holland. They are noticeable for their lip, which is posticous, peltate, unguiculate, and highly irritable. In fine weather or when undisturbed this lip bends back and leaves the column uncovered; but if it rains, or the plant is jarred, down goes the lip over the column, which it boxes up securely. (Treas. of Bot.)

cāl-ęshe', s. [CALASH.]

Cāl-ē-dō'-ni-ąn, a. & s. [Lat. Caledonia = Scotland.]

A. As adjective: Of or pertaining to Caledonia, the ancient name of Scotland.

B. As substantive: A native of Caledonia; a Scotchman.

cāl-ē-dō'-ni-ą-īte, s. [In Fr. calédonite; Eng. Caledon (a); -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral consisting of carbonate of copper and sulphate and carbonate of lead. It is found in minute bluish-green crystals, in association with other ores of lead, in Lanarkshire. It is orthorhombic, rather brittle, translucent, and of a verdigris or bluish-green colour. Sp. gr., 6·4. Compos.: Sulphate of lead, 55·6; carbonate of lead, 33·6; carbonate of copper, 11·4. (Dana.)

cāl'-ē-dūct, s. [CALIDUCT.]

† cāl-ē-fā'-ci-ent, a. & s. [Lat. calefaciens, pr. par. of calefacio = to make hot; calidus = hot; facio = to make.]

A. As adj.: Causing or exciting heat or warmth.

B. As substan.: A medicine or preparation calculated to produce heat or warmth.

† cāl-ē-fāc-tion, s. [Fr. calefaction; Lat. calefactio = a making hot or warm; calidus = hot; factio = a making; from facio = to make.]

1. The act or process of making anything hot or warm. (Lit. & fig.)

"... by a motion contrary to that of calefaction, by which the internal parts are called outwards."—Bacon.

"... thou seekest in humility to be enabled to a devout lustre and calefaction of others."—Waterhouse: Apology for Learning, 1653, p. 138.

2. The state or condition of being hot or warm. (Lit. & fig.)

"As [if] the remembrance of calefaction can warm a man in a cold frosty night."—More: Philos. Poems, xii. 5. Prol.

 cāl-ē-fāc'-tive, a. [Formed by analogy from Lat. calefactus, pa. par. of calefacio = to make hot.] Having the property of exciting heat or warmth.

"Calefactive, hasid, and penetrating the elementary matter."—Hale: Prim. Orig.

cāl-ē-fāc'-tōr, s. [Lat. calefactor = he who or that which makes hot; Fr. calefacteur.]

1. Gen.: Anything which excites warmth or heat.

2. Spec.: A kind of stove. (Tomr.)

† cāl-ē-fāc'-tōr-y, a. & s. [Lat. calefactorius; from calefacio = to make hot.]

A. As adj.: Producing heat or warmth, communicating heat.

"These calefactory engines they popped down under their stalls. . . ."—Bodily Telegraph, Jan. 11, 1866.

B. As substan.: A place or room for producing heat or warmth; a vessel in which to heat things. (Ash.)

† cāl-ē-fȳ, v.i. & t. [Lat. calefio = to become hot; calidus = hot; fio = to become.]

A. Intrans.: To become or be made hot; to be heated.

"Crystal will calefy into electricity."—Browne: Vulgar Errours.

B. Trans.: To heat, make hot or warm.

 cāl'-ēm-bōurg, s. [Of uncertain origin; supposed to be from a certain Count Kahlemberg, noted for his blunders in French (Webster.). Or from the "Jester of Kahlenberg," whose name was Wigand von Theben, a character introduced in "Tyll Eulenspiegel," a German tale. (Brewer: Phrase and Fable.).] A pun.

cāl'-ēn-dąr, * cāl'-ēn-dore, * kāl'-ēn-dar, * kāl'-ēn-dēr, s. & a. [Lat. calendarium = an account-book of interest kept by money-lenders, so called from the interest being due on the calends (Lat. calendæ), or first of each month.] [CALENDS.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) A register or list of the days of the year, according to its divisions into days, weeks, and months, showing the various civil and ecclesiastical holidays, festivals, &c.

"Cursed be the day when first I did appear:
Let it be blotted from the calendar."
Dryden: Palamon & Arcite, ii. 98.

"What hath this day deserved? what hath it done,
That it in golden letter should be set Among the high tides in the calendar?"
Shakesp.: King John, iii. 1.

* (2) An almanac.

"Give me a calendar.
Who saw the sun to-day?"
Shakesp.: Rich. III., v. 3.

* 2. Figuratively:

(1) An artificial almanac

"Do you, for your own benefit, construct A calendar of flow'rs, pluck'd as they blow."
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vi.

(2) A list or register, a roll.

"... the care I have had to even your content, I wish might be found in the calendar of my past endeavours."—Shakesp.: All's Well, i. 3.

(3) A compendium, an abstract, or epitome.

"Indeed, to speak fashingly of him, he is the extract and calendar of gentry, for you shall find in him the ornament of each part a gentleman would see."—Shakesp.: Hamlet, v. 2.

II. Technically:

1. A catalogue or abstract of state papers.

2. Law: A list or register of cases to be tried in a court of law; a register of the names of prisoners.

"The manage is for the judge to open the calendar or list of all the prisoners' names."—Blackstone: Com. bk. iv., ch. 33.

"Rhadamanthus, who tries the lighter causes, leaving to his two brethren the heavy calendars."—Lamb: Last Essays of Elia.

3. Astron. & Chron.: The Roman calendar is said to have been introduced by Romulus about 738 B.C., and modified by Numa Pompilius about 713 B.C. In 46 B.C., Julius Cæsar, giving effect to the calculations of Sosigenes, an Alexandrian mathematician and astronomer, reformed the calendar, and introduced the Julian style, by which the year was made to consist of 365 days, with 366 every fourth or leap year. He commenced it also with January 1st, the adjustment producing the year of confusion, which contained 445 days. Had the solar year consisted of 365 days, 6 hours, the Julian calendar would have been perfect; but its real length is 365 days, 5 hours, 48 minutes, 45½ seconds. The operation of the odd minutes and seconds continued during the next fifteen centuries, having again deranged the calendar ten days. Pope Gregory XIII. made A.D. 1582 consist of 355 days only, and otherwise adjusted the calendar. Roman Catholic countries at once adopted the reform. Protestant states one after another followed the example, while Russia and the Greek Church conserved the old Julian arrangement. When the new style was adopted in England by Act of Parliament in 1752, eleven days required to be struck out, the 3rd of October being called the 14th. From this time the difference began between new and old style. To prevent further rearrangement the Gregorian arrangement provide that only one in four of the years ending centuries shall be leap years; thus the years 1700 and 1800 were not leap years, nor will 1900 be, but 2000 will.

B. As adjective: (See the compounds.)

calendar-clock, s. A clock which indicates not merely the hour and minute of the day, but also the day of the week and month, and in some cases even the year and the phases of the moon. (Knight.) calendar-month, s. A month which, if it be January, has 31 days, if February, has 28 or 29, if March, has 31, &c.

cāl'-ēn-dąr, v.t. [CALENDAR, s.] To register; set down in a list. Especially said of inserting in the Calendar of Saints.

"Than many just and holy men, whose names Are register'd and calendar'd for saints."
Spenser: Shepheard's Kalender: Epigram.

"Twelve have been ... years for religion, of whom ten are calendared ... saints."—Waterhouse: Apol. for Learning 1653.

† cāl'-ēn-dār'-ȳ, s. [CALENDAR, s.] Of or pertaining to a calendar.

cāl'-ēn-dąr-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [CALENDAR, v.]

A. & B. As present participle & participle adjective: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

C. As substantive: The act of registering or inserting in a calendar or list.

 cāl'-ēn-dar-ȳ, a. [Lat. calendarius = pertaining to a calendar.] Pertaining to or contained in the calendar.

 cāl'-ēnde, s. [CALENDS.]

cāl'-ēn-dēr, v.t. [CALENDER (1), s.] To smooth cloth, linen, &c., by pressing it so as to give it a glaze or gloss. (Johnson.)

cāl'-ēn-dēr (1), s. [Fr. calandre; Low Lat. calendra; from cylindrus; Gr. κύλινδρος (kulindros) = a cylinder, roller; Fr. calandrer; Port. calandrar = to smooth or calender cloth.]

1. A press or machine in which cloth or paper is smoothed and pressed for the purpose of giving it a glaze or gloss.

2. A calendrer.

"And my good friend the calender
Will lend his horse to go."
Cowper: John Gilpin.

cal-en-der (2),  kil-en-der, s. [Fr. from Hind. qalandar.] One of an order of dervishes amongst the Mohammedans.

"Thirty nations in the habit of pilgrim kalenders."—Sir Thomas Herbert: Travels, p. 70.

 cal-en-der-graph-er, s. [Lat. calendarium = a calendar, and Gr. γράφω (graphō) = to write, compose.] One who writes or draws up calendars or almanacs.

"This is that scripture which Dr Pell sent word to the society that Eichstadius himself, and almost all calender-graphers had skipped over."—Boyle: Works, vol. vi. p. 164.

cal-en-drer, cal-en-der-er, s. [Fr. calandreur.] One whose business or profession it is to calender cloths. (Johnson.)

 cal-en-dri-cal, a. [M. Eng. calendr(e) = a calendar; suff. -ical.] Of or pertaining to a calendar. (Webster.) cal-ends,  cal-ende, kl-lendes,  ka-lendin, s. pl. [Lat. calendæ; from an old verb calo = to call; Gr. καλέω (kaleō); A.S. celand.]

I. Literally:

1. The first day of each month in the Roman calendar

"Calendis (Calendæ, f. l. Calendæ."—Promptorium Parvulorum.

"Another division of their months into idus, nonæ, and calendæ. . . ."—Holland's version of Suetonius: Vulgar Errors, etc.

2. Applied by Wycliffe to the Jewish Feast of the New Moon.

"Your kalendis han to-morwe."—Wycliffe: 1 Kings xx. 5.

* II. Fig.: The first or beginning of anything.

"Soone at hoppe the kalendis begynne."—Chaucer: Prol., l. 3.

¶ To fix anything for the Greek Calends: To postpone it indefinitely; the term calends not being used amongst the Greeks. In naming the day of the month the Romans did not count straight forward, but backwards; thus, they did not say the 25th or 26th of June, but the 6th or 5th day before the calends of July.

cal-en-du-la, s. [Lat. calendæ, from their flowering almost every month.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, of which one species, Calendula officinalis, the Garden Marigold, is common in Britain. They are showy plants, and are in some places used in cookery. Distilled water or vinegar was formerly made from the flowers, and they are still sometimes used to adulterate saffron.

cal-en-du-line, cal-en-du-lin, s. [Lat. calendula.]

Chem.: A gum extracted from the marigold.

 ca-lenge,  ca-lengen, v.t. & i. [CHALLENGE, v.]

cal-en-ture, s. [Fr calenture; Sp. calentura = heat, fever; from calentar = to heat; Lat. calco = to be hot.] A distemper occurring in warm climates, and peculiar to natives of colder regions, in which, according to Quincy, sailors imagine the sea to be green fields, and will throw themselves into it.

"So by a calenture misled,
The mariner with rapture sees,
On the smooth ocean a smire bed,
Enamelled fields and verdant trees." Swift.

ca-lip-ter-yx, s. [Gr. καλός (kalos) = beautiful, πτερύξ (pterux) = a wing.]

Entom.: A genus of Neuropterous insects, belonging to the family Libellulidæ. Calepteryx virgo is a beautiful species, with its body of a steel blue colour, and a large dark patch on its wings.

cal-les-cence, s. [Lat. calescens, pr. par of calesco = to grow warm; an inchoative form from caleo = to be hot.] Increasing heat, growing warmth  cal-ewe, s. [From A.S calu = bald.] [CALLOW.] A bald pate, a shaveling.

"Out! what hath the calewe life what hath the calewe life Robert of Gloucester, in Hymn Eur. Eng. (Morris & Skeat), p. 11.)

† cale-wets, s. [O. Fr. caillouet.] A kind of pear. (Chaucer.) calf (1),  halt,  holf (pl. calves) (l silent), s. & a. [A.S cealf; Dut. & Sw. kalf; Dan. kalv; Ger. kalb.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) The young of a cow.

"The colt hath about four years of growth, and so the horse, and so the calf."—Bacon: Natural History.

(2) The young of other mammals, as the elephant, rhinoceros, &c.

2. Figuratively:

(1) In contempt:

(a) A silly person, so called because the calf is not remarkable for intelligence

"Some silly dunting brainless calf,
That understands things by the half."
Drayton: Nymp.

(b) A coward.

(c) A person fond of drinking milk. (Colloquial.)

(2) Geog.: A Norwegian name, also used in the Hebrides, for islets lying off islands, and bearing a similar relation to them in size that a calf does to a cow, as "the Calf of Man," "the Calf at Mull." (Smyth.)

(3) Script., "Calves of the lips": Sacrifices, probably of thanksgiving, offered to God as calves were in Jewish worship. Or possibly actual sacrifices vowed by the lips.

"Turn to the Lord, and say unto him, Take away all iniquity, and receive us graciously: so will we render the calves of our lips."—Hosea xiv 2.

II. Book-binding: A fine leather made of the hide or skin of a calf, much used in the binding of books.

B. As adjective: (See the compounds.)

¶ Compound of obvious signification: Calf-like.

Bookbinding: Bound in calf-skin leather

"I have been tolling and moiling lately for a year pass, among dusty old bookstall treasures, and sealskin easily collected as many tattered, dog-eared, once calf-bound volumes as I could find of the British essayists of the eighteenth century."—Sala: Sacred of Mabey Hogrobbin Esq.

ca-lix-tin (2), s. [CALIXTINES.]

Cal-ix-tines, s. pl. [From Lat. calix = a cup, which the sect or party wished restored to the people in the Lord's Supper.]

Ch. Hist.: A Christian sect in Bohemia, the more moderate of the two great sections into which the Hussites were divided in 1420. Unlike the Taborites—the other and extreme section—they did not seek to subvert the constitution and government of the Church of Rome, but demanded (1) the restoration of the cup to the people in the celebration of the Supper; (2) the preaching of the Gospel in its primitive simplicity and purity; (3) the separation of the priests from secular, and their entire devotion to spiritual, concerns; and (4) the prevention or punishment, by lawful authority, of "mortal" sins, e.g., simony, debauchery, &c. The council of Basel, in 1433, to end the disastrous Bohemian war, invited envoys from the Hussites. Procopius Rasa their leader since the death of the famous John Ziska in 1424—and others appeared, but the effort failed. Afterwards the council sent Æneas Sylvius into Bohemia. He, by conceding the use of the cup to the Calixtines, reconciled them to the Church of Rome. [HUSSITES.]

Ichthy.: The Dragonets, a genus of fishes of the family Gobiidæ, or Gobies, the typical one of the sub-family Callionymidæ. The anterior dorsal fin, supported by a few setaceous rays, is frequently very elevated; the second dorsal and anal are elongated.

căl-lĭ'-ŏ-pē, s. [Lat. Calliope; Gr. καλλιόπη (kalliopē) = the beautiful-voiced; κάλλος (kallos) = beauty; ὄψ (ops), genit. ὄπος (opos) = voice.]

1. Myth.: The chief of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne (Memory), who presided over eloquence and heroic poetry. She was the mother of Orpheus.

2. Astron.: An asteroid, the twenty-second found. It was discovered by Hind, on the 16th November, 1852.

3. Music: A series of steam-whistles toned to produce musical notes. These are sometimes played on the upper or hurricane deck of steam-boats to amuse the passengers and astonish the natives on shore. (American.) (Knight.)

• căl-lĭ-ŏŏr, s. [CALIVER.] (Scotch.) căl-lĭ-pāsh, s. [CALIPASH.]

căl'-lĭ-pēe, s. [CALIPEE.]

căl'-lĭp-ĕrs, s. [CALIPERS.]

"Callipers measure the distance of any round, cylindrick, conical body; so that when workmen use them, they open the two points to their prescribed width and turn so much stuff off the intended piece, till the two points of the callipers fit just over their work."—Moxon: Mechanical Exercises.

căl-lĭ-sāu'-rŭs, s. [Gr. κάλλος (kallos), and σαῦρος (sauros) = a lizard, a saurian.]

Zool.: A genus of the great bellied or frog lizards, Agamidæ. It contains the C. draconoides of Blainville.

căl-lĭs-thĕn'-ĭc, căl-lĭs-thĕn'-ĭcs, a. [Gr. καλλισθενής (kallisthenēs) = adorned with strength; κάλλος (kallos) = beauty, καλος (kalos) = beautiful, fine; σθένος (sthenos) = strength; Fr. calisthenie.] Pertaining to calisthenics.

căl-lĭs-thĕn'-ĭcs, căl-lĭs-thĕn'-ĭcs, s. pl. [Gr. καλλισθενής (kallisthenēs) = adorned with strength: κάλλος (kallos) = beauty, σθένος (sthenos) = strength.] The art or science of healthful exercise for the body and limbs, to promote gracefulness and strength.

căl-lĭs'-tŭs, s. [Gr. κάλλιστος (kallistos), super. of κάλος (kalos) = beautiful.]

Entom.: A genus of colcopterous insects, belonging to the family Carabidæ. Only one species, C. lunatus, is British. It is a beautiful beetle of about a quarter of an inch long, with a greenish-black head, a reddish-yellow thorax, and yellow elytra with six reddish-black spots.

căl-lĭ-thăm'-nĭ-ŏn, s. [Gr. κάλλος (kallos) = beauty; θάμνιον (thamnion) = a little bush, θάμνος (thamnos) = a bush.]

Bot.: A genus of Ceramiaceæ (Florideous Algæ), containing a large number of species, some common, many rare. The fanelle are naked, and the tetraspores are tetrahedrally arranged. (Griff. & Henfrey.) căl'-lĭ-thrĭx, s. [Gr. κάλλος (kallos), and θριξ (thrix), genit. τριχός (trichos) = hair.]

Zool.: The Cercopithecus sabæus, or Green Monkey, a species very common in menageries.

căl-lĭt-rĭch-ă'-cē-æ, s. pl. [Eng. callitriche, and nom. fem. pl. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: The Starworts, a genus of small aquatic plants, with simple entire opposite leaves and minute unisexual axillary flowers. The genus has been most frequently associated with other minute flowered aquatic plants, under Haloragæ, but, more recently, it has been proposed, upon more plausible grounds, to consider it as a much-reduced aquatic Euphorbiaceæ. C. aquatica is common in our ponds and still waters, and is found in most parts of the world. (Treas. of Botany.)

căl-lĭt'-rĭch-ē, s. [Gr. κάλλος (kallos), and θριξ (thrix), genit. τριχός (trichos) = hair.]

Bot.: Water Starwort, a genus of British aquatic plants, the typical one of the order Callitrichaceæ (q. v.).

căl-lĭ-tris, s. [Etym. doubtful; the first element is apparently Gr. καλλι- (kalli-), combining form of κάλος (kalos) = beautiful.]

Bot.: A genus of plants natural order Coniferæ. Callitris quadrivalvis is selected by Lindley to furnish sandarach. Consequently it is called the Sandarach-tree. It is from Barbary, where its hard and durable mahogany-like wood is extensively used in the construction of mosques căl-lō-rhўn'-chŭs, • [Gr. κάλλος (kallos) = beauty, ῥύγχος (rhunchos) = a snout.]

Ichthyol.: A genus of fishes having the snout terminating in a fleshy lobe, which curves over in front of the mouth and entirely surrounding the sides of the tail, which is pointed.

căl-lŏs-ĭ-tў, s. [Fr. callosité, Lat. callositas.] A kind of swelling or hard skin on any part of the body; preternatural hardness of skin, such as is caused by hard labour.

"The surgeon ought to vary the diet of his patient, as he finds the fibres loosen too much, are too flaccid, or produce funguses; or as they harden into callosities. In the first case, wine, bitters, and liquors are useful, in the last, acids."—Arbuth. & Ox Diet.

căl lō sō, in comp. [From Lat. callosus = with a hard skin, callum = hardened skin.] With a hard skin.

Bot.: Having serratures which are also callosities. (Treas. of Bot.) căl-lo-sō'-mą, s. [CALOSOMA.]

căl-lŏt, s. [CALOTTE.]

cal-lour, s. [CALLER, a.] cal-loùs, a. [Fr. calleux = thick or hard-skinned; Lat. callosus, from callus, callum = a hard skin; calleo = to have a hard or thick skin.]

1. Lit.: Having the skin or outer covering hardened; indurated.

"In progress of time, the ulcers became sinuous and callous with induration of the glands."—Wiseman.

2. Fig.: Unfeeling; hardened in feeling.

"Now crawl from cradle to the grave, Slaves—say, the basest of a slave,
And callous, save to crime."
Byron: The Giaour

". . . quiet into the belief that divine grace had touched the most false and callous of human hearts."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

cal-loùs-ly, adv. [Eng. callous; -ly.] In a callous manner. (Lit. & fig.).

cal-loùs-nèss, s. [Eng. callous; -ness.]

1. Lit.: The state of having the skin or outer covering hardened; induration of the fibres.

"The oftener we use the organs of touching, the more of these scales are formed, and the skin becomes the thicker, and so a callousness grows upon it."—Chagne.

2. Fig.: The state of being hardened in feeling; insensibility.

". . . but there were instances when this seeming callousness struck the observer as being inexpressibly shocking."—Daily Telegraph, Jan. 28, 1881.

† 1. Bald.

"A man of whom hedd heeris fleten awei is calu."—Wycliffe: Lantt., xiii. 40. (Parvey.)

2. Unfledged, destitute of feathers.

"The callow thrustle lispeth."
Tennyson: Claribel.

3. Youthful, immature.

cal-lū-na, s. [From Gr. καλλύνω (kallunō) = to sweep, to clean, from the fact that the twigs are used for brooms.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, order Ericaceæ (Heaths). Calluna vulgaris, sometimes called the Ling, is the Common Heath, or Heather, and the most abundant species of the family in Britain. It is the plant whose flowers render the slopes of most Scottish hills pink in autumn, and the one so abundant in Epping Forest. Ornamental varieties are sometimes grown in gardens, in which it forms an excellent edging for flower-plots. Its twigs are also made into brooms. The plant is astringent, and is employed both by fullers and dyers, and the flowers are very attractive to bees.

1. Med.: Any unnatural hardening of the skin, arising from friction or pressure.

"A callus extending up the forehead."—Pennant. Zoology, ii. 494.

2. Anat.: An osseous formation serving to join the extremities of broken bones.

3. Bot.: A leathery or hardened thickening on a limited portion of an organ.

calm, calme (l silent), a. & s. [Fr. calme; Prov. chaume = a resting-time for flocks; O. Fr. chaumer = to be at rest; Low Lat. cauma = heat of the sun; Gr. καῦμα (kauma) = great heat; καίω (kaiō) = to burn; Sp., Port., & Ital. calma; Dut. kalm. The radical meaning is thus a rest during the heat of the day.]

A. As adjective:

1. Of the elements: Still, quiet, serene; undisturbed by any wind or other cause.

"As the wilde wode rage
Of sowdes maketh the see salvage,
And that, as calme bringeth unto waive."
Gower: Conf. Amant., iii. 230.

"The seas waxed calm."
Shakesp.: Com. of Errors, i. 1.

2. Of human beings: Quiet in manner or temperament; unexcited in gesture or language.

"And, not disprising whom we praised (therein
He was as calm as virtuous), he began His mistress' picture."
Shakesp.: Cymbeline, v. 5.

"Tamed are the warrior's pride and strength,
And calm and still are nations at length."
Hemans: Abuse in Italy.

3. Of things: Undisturbing, quieting, soothing, quiet; in tone or language.

"All is calm in this eternal sleep."
Pope: Eloisa to Abelard, 313.

". . . 'mid the calm, oblivious tendencies Of Nature, . . ."
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. i.

B. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Of the elements: Stillness, quiet.

"And the wind ceased, and there was a great calm."
Mark, iv. 39.

"A motion from the river won Ridged the smooth level, bearing on My shallop thro' the star-strewn calm."
Tennyson: Recol. of the Arabian Nights.

2. Of human beings: Quietness in temperament or actions, serenity.

"Our bloods are now in calm."
Shakesp.: Troil. & Cress., iv. 1.

3. Of things generally: Quietness, peacefulness, freedom from disturbance.

"Thy life a long dead calm of fixed repose."
Pope: Eloisa to Abelard, 251.

II. Meteor. & Hydrol.: In the same sense as B. 1. A part of the Atlantic immediately north of the equator, intermediate between the regions swept by the north-east and south-east trade winds, is called the Region of Calms. It varies in extent and position, being affected by the annual course of the sun. The calm within the area is not perpetual; it is disturbed for a brief period every day by a passing squall.

¶ Blair thus discriminates between tranquillity, peace, and calm: Tranquillity respects a situation free from trouble, considered in itself; peace, the same situation with respect to any causes that might interrupt it; calm with regard to a disturbed situation going before or following it. A good man enjoys tranquillity in himself, peace with others, and calm after the storm. (Blair: Lect. on Rhetoric and Belles Lettres (1817), vol. ii., p. 231.)

calm-browed, a. With a brow undisturbed by care or excitement.

calm weather, † calme wedyr, s. A calm at sea, a dead calm.

"Calma vedyr. Malacia, calmacia, C. P."—Prompt. Parv.

calm, † calme (l silent), v.i. & t. [CALM, s.]

† A. Intrans.: To become quiet, or still.

"Than gan it to calme and clere all abought."
Deposit. of Rich. II., p. 27.

B. Transitive:

1. Of the elements: To render still or quiet.

2. Of human beings: To pacify, appease, soothe, free from excitement.

"To calme the tempest of his troubled thought."
Spenser: F. Q., IV. ii. 3.

"'Oh, calm thee, Chief!' the Minstrel cried."
Scott: Lady of the Lake, vi. 14.

calmed (l silent), pa. par. & a. [CALM, v.] calm'-èr (l silent), s. [Eng. calm; -er.] He who or that which calms or quiets; a soother, a sedative.

"Angling was, after tedious study, a rest to his mind, a cheerer of his spirits, a diverter of sadness, a calmer of unquiet thoughts, a moderator of passions, a procurer of contentedness."—I. Walton: Complete Angler.

† calm'-èr-age (age as ĭj), a. [CAMMERAGE.] Of or belonging to cambric.

"Ane stick of calmerage clailthe."—Aberd. Reg.

calmes, caums (pron. câmz), s. pl. [Etym. doubtful. Jamieson suggests Ger. quemen, bequemen = to fit, prepare.]

I. Literally:

1. A mould; a frame, for whatever purpose. Thus it is used for a mould in which bullets are cast.

"Item, landit man within the samin, sall have an haghute of founde, calit haghute of crochert, with their calmes, bullettis and pellokis of leid or irne."—Acta Ja. V., 1540, c. 71, ed. 1566, c. 104.

2. A name given to the small cords through which the warp is passed in the loom. Synon. with heddles (q.v.).

II. Fig.: Used to denote the formation of a plan or model.

"The matter of peace is now in the caulms, i.e., they are attempting to model it."—Baillie's Lett., ii. 197.

* Caums, sing., is sometimes used, but more rarely. Anything neat is said to look as if it had been "casten in a caums." (Scotch.)

* cal mews, s. [Etym. doubtful; perhaps cal = cald; the second element is apparently = mew (1), s., but cf. calmuse.] calm'-ing (l silent), pr. par., a., & s. [CALM, v.]

A. & B. As present participle & participial adjective: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

C. As subst.: The act of quieting or making calm.

calm'-ly (l silent), adv. [Eng. calm; -ly.] In a calm or quiet manner. Used—

1. Of the elements:

"In nature things move violently to their place, and calmly in their place; so virtue in ambition is violent, in authority settled and calm."—Bacon.

2. Of human beings:

"Calmly he looked on either life."
Pope: Epistles, ii. 7.

"Is it some yet imperial hope,
That with such change can calmly cope?"
Byron: Ode to Napoleon.

calm'-nèss (l silent), s. [Eng. calm; -ness.] The state of being calm. Used—

1. Of the elements:

"Calmness silvered o'er the deep."
Pope: Homer's Odyssey, x. 168.

2. Of human beings:

"Defend yourself
By calmness or by silence."
Shakesp.: Coriol., iii. 2.

"Could this mean peace? the calmness of the good?
Or guilt grown cold in desperate hardihood?"
Byron: Lara, i. 24.

* calm'-y (l silent), a. [Eng. calm; -y.] Calm, peaceful, quiet.

"Six calmy days and six smooth nights we sail."
Pope: Homer's Odyssey, bk. xv., 511.

cal-ò-cer-a, s. [Gr. καλός (kalos) = beautiful, κέρας (keras) = a horn.]

Bot.: A genus of Clavarieæ (Hymenomycetous Fungi), differing from Clavaria in the subcartilaginous texture and viscid hymenium. C. viscosa, which occurs on decayed pine stumps, is one of our most beautiful fungi. Three or four more species occur in this country. (Griffith & Henfrey.) cal-ò-chòr'-tus, s. [Gr. καλός (kalos) = beautiful, χόρτος (chortos) = grass.]

Bot.: A genus of beautiful bulbous plants, order Liliaceæ. They are natives of Columbia, Mexico, &c. They have tunicated bulbs, and produce rigid ensiform leaves, and an erect scape, supporting a few large showy flowers, which are racemosely arranged, and remain open for several days. Calochortus venustus is one of the handsomest. (Treas. of Bot.) cal-ò-dèn'-drŏn, s. [From Gr. καλός (kalos) = beautiful, and δένδρον (dendron) = a tree.]

cal-ò-phyl-lum, s. [From Gr. καλός (kalos) beautiful, and phyllum, a Latinised form of

Gr. φύλλον (phúllon) = a leaf. Named from the shining leaves, marked by fine transverse veins.]

Bot.: A genus of plants belonging to the order Clusiaceæ (Guttiferæ). Sepals, 2—4; petals, 4; stamina, many; style, 1; stigma, peltate-lobed. Flowers in racemes, sometimes unisexual. About twenty-five species are known, mostly from the eastern hemisphere, though a few are from the western world. Calophyllum Calaba is the Calaba-tree of the West Indies and of Brazil. [CALABA.] C. inophyllum, from the East Indies and Malayan regions, is a large tree sometimes 100 feet high. Its timber is used for masts and spars. A greenish-coloured resin from the trunk constitutes a kind of tacamahac. Its seeds furnish a dark-green, thick, sweet-scented oil, used in India to cure and in medicine. C. tomentosum, of Ceylon, also furnishes timber and oil. C. Tacamahaca, on the Isle of Bourbon and Madagascar, and C. brasiliense, in Brazil, also yield resin. The fruits of C. spurium, of Malabar, and C. edule and Madruno, of South America, are eaten.

cāl-or-ēs-çençe, s. [Formed from Lat. calor = heat, on analogy of calescence, &c.] The change of invisible into visible heat.

". . . for the new phenomena here described I have proposed the term calorescence."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science, 3rd ed., viii. 8, p. 192.

cal-ŏr-ic, s. & a. [In Fr. calorique; Lat. calor = warmth, heat, glow; from caleo = to be warm or hot.]

A. As subst.: The principle of heat, the natural agency by which heat is produced.

B. As adj.: Pertaining to the principle of heat or the natural agency which produces it.

caloric engine, s. The name given by Ericsson to his hot-air engine.

caloric paradox, s. The assumption by drops of water, when thrown on a hot metallic surface, of the spheroidal form, each liquid spheroid being surrounded by an atmosphere of its own vapour, which prevents it from being properly in contact with the metal. It is called also Leidenfrost's phenomenon.

† cāl-ŏr-ĭç-ĭ-tў, s. [Lat. calor (genit. caloris) = heat; Eng. suff. -ity.] A faculty in living beings of developing heat to resist external cold. (Dunn.) cal-ŏr-ĭ-dŭct, s. [Lat. calor (genit. caloris) = heat; ductus = a leading, a duct; duco = to lead.] A pipe or passage for conducting heat.

cāl'-ō-rie, cāl'-ō-ry, s. A practical unit of heat, corresponding to the quantity of heat required to raise one degree centigrade the temperature of a given volume of water (one kilogram, in the case of the great or kilogram calorie, and a gram, in that of the small or gram calorie).

cāl-ŏr-if-ic, * cāl-ŏr-if-ick, a. & s. [In Fr. calorifique; from Lat. calorificus; from calor (genit. caloris) = heat, facio (pass. fio) = to make, cause.]

A. As adj.: Having the property or quality of producing heat; heating.

"A calorifick principle is either excited within the heated body, or transferred to it, through any medium, from some other. —Grew.

". . . the sun pours forth a multitude of other rays more powerfully calorific than the luminous ones, but entirely unsuited to the purposes of vision."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science, 3rd ed., xiii. 1, p. 174.

* B. As subst.: An apparatus for conveying or conducting heat in houses, &c.; a hot-water apparatus.

* cāl-ŏr-if-ĭ-cal, a. [Eng. calorific; -al.] Calorific.

This I find concerning dew, as it is of a calorifical nature.—Simon Speculum Mundi, p. 147. (Latham.)

† cal-ŏr-if-ĭ-cā'-tion, s. [Eng. calorific; -ation.] The production of heat, especially animal heat, in bodies.

cal-ŏr-ĭ-fĭç'-ĭ-ent, s. [Lat. calor (genit. caloris) = heat; faciens (genit. facientis), pr. par. of facio = to make.] Having the power or property of causing or producing heat, heating.

cāl-ŏr-if'-ics, s. [CALORIFIC.] The science which treats of appliances for producing or communicating heat.

cāl-ŏr-im'-ē-tėr, s. [Fr. calorimètre; from Lat. calor = warmth, heat, and Gr. μέτρον (metron) = a measure.] An instrument for measuring the quantity of heat which a body parts with or absorbs when its temperature sinks or rises through a certain number of degrees, or when it changes its condition. An ice-calorimeter was invented by Lavoisier and Laplace. It is now superseded by the mercury-calorimeter of Favre and Silbermann, which is a very delicate instrument. It is essentially a thermometer with a very large bulb and a capillary tube. (See Atkinson: Ganot's Physics; Heat., ch. ix.)

cal-ŏr-ĭ-mĕt'-rĭc, a. [Eng. calorimetr(y); -ic.] Of or pertaining to calorimetry.

cāl-ŏr-im'-ĕt-rў, s. [Lat. calor = warmth, heat, and Gr. μέτρον (metron) = a measure.] The measurement of caloric in the way described under Calorimeter (q.v.). (See Atkinson: Ganot's Physics; On Heat, ch. ix. Calorimetry.)

cal-ŏr-ĭ-mō'-tŏr, s. [Lat. calor (genit. caloris) = heat, and motor = a mover: moveo = to move.] A galvanic instrument for evolving caloric.

* cā-lŏr mor-dăc-ąnç, s. [Lat. calor = heat; mordicans = biting, mordico = to bite.]

Med.: An old term for the almost burning heat of the skin in ardent fevers, which causes an unpleasant sensation on the fingers after touching the patient. (Hooper.)

cāl-ō-sō'-mą, s. [Gr. καλός (kalos) = beautiful, σῶμα (sôma) = a body.]

Entom.: A genus of coleopterous insects of the family Carnivora and tribe Carabidæ. Two species are British, C. sycophanta and C. inquisitor.

* cāl-ō-stig'-mą, s. [Gr. καλός (kalos) = beautiful; στίγμα (stigma) = a stigma.]

Bot.: A genus of Asclepiadaceæ, consisting of three species of climbing shrubs, natives of Brazil. The calyx is five-parted, corolla bell-shaped, and the elongated projecting stigma has a prominent apex.

cāl-ō-thăm'-nŭs, s. [From Gr. καλός (kalos) = beautiful, and θάμνος (thamnos) = a bush, a shrub.]

Bot.: A genus of Myrtaceæ. Various beautiful species grow in Australia.

cāl'-ō-thrix, s. [Gr. καλός (kalos) = beautiful, θρίξ (thrix) = hair.]

Bot.: A genus of Oscillatoriæ (Confervoid Algæ), growing in tufts, the filaments forming a branched frond, by lying in apposition. C. mirabilis is a rare freshwater species in England, found on mosses in small streams, æruginous green, growing blackish. (Griffith & Henfrey.)

cā-lŏt'-rŏp-is, s. [Gr. καλός (kalos) = beautiful, and τρόπις (tropis) = a keel, from the shape of the flower.]

Bot.: A genus of Asclepiads, consisting of three species, which form shrubs or small trees, and are natives of the tropics of Asia and Africa. Their flowers have a somewhat bell-shaped corolla, expanding into five divisions. Calotropis gigantea, the largest of the genus, forms a branching shrub or small tree about fifteen feet high, with a short trunk four or five inches in diameter. Its flowers are of a pretty rose-purple colour. Cloth and paper have been made from the silky down of the seeds. The bark of the roots of several of the species furnishes the substance called madar, which is used in India as a diaphoretic. The juice has been found very efficacious in the cure of elephantiasis, in syphilis, and sarcocarca. From the bark of the plant is made a substance called Madarine (q.v.). The bark of the young branches also yields a valuable fibre. The leaves warmed and moistened with oil are applied as a dry fomentation in pain of the stomach; they are a valuable rubefacient. The root, reduced to powder, is given in India to horses. An intoxicating liquor, called Bur, is made from the madar by the hillmen about Mahabuleshwar, in the Western Ghauts.

cą-lŏ'tte, cą-lŏt'e, * cāl-lŏt, s. [Fr. calotte = a cap.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The plain round skull-cap worn by Roman ecclesiastics to cover the tonsure.

"We
That tread the path of public service know
What a tacit shrug is, or a shrug,
The wearing the callot, the politic hood,
And twenty other purveys."
B. Jonson: Magn. Lady, i.

* 2. Anything shaped like a cap, the hilt of a sword.

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: A concavity, in the form of a cup or niche, lathed and plastered, serving to diminish the height of a chapel, alcove, cabinet, which otherwise would appear too high for the breadth. (Gwilt.)

2. Math.: The section of a sphere having a circle for its base.

cāl'-ō-tўpe, s. [From Gr. καλός (kalos) = beautiful, and τύπος (tupos) = a blow, an impression.]

Photog.: A process invented by Fox Talbot by which paper saturated with iodine of silver is exposed to the action of light, the latent image being subsequently developed and fixed by hyposulphite of soda.

* cal'-ouwe, a. [CALLOW.]

† cā-lŏy'-ĕrs, * cā-lŏg'-ĕr-ī, s. pl. [Fr. caloyer; from Mod. Gr. καλογερος (kalogeros) = a monk; Gr. καλος (kalos) = beautiful, good, γερων (gerôn), M. Gr. γερος (geros) = an old man.]

Ch. Hist.: Monks of the Greek Church, who resided chiefly on Mount Athos and were celebrated for their extreme austerity.

"Here dwells the caloyer, nor rude is he, Nor uncouth in his cheer."
Byron: Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, ii. 6.

cālp, s. [Etym. doubtful; probably of Iberian origin.]

Chem.: A sub-species of carbonate of lime of a bluish-black colour with a streak of white; it is intermediate between compact limestone and marl.

cāl'-pāc, s. (For def. see quotation.)

"The calpac is the solid cap or centre part of the head dress; the shawl is wound round it, and forms the turban."—Byron: Note to the Giaour.

"Angel of Death! 'tis ill mean a coward foe:
His calpac rent—his caftan red."
Ibid.: The Giaour.

cāl'-sāy, s. [CAUSEWAY.] (Scotch.) calsay-paiker, s. A street walker. (Scotch.) cāl'-shie, a. [Perhaps from Icel. kalsa = to deride.] Crabbed, perverse, cross. (Scotch.)

* cal-sounds, s. [CALZOONS.]

* cal'-stocke, s. [CUSTOCK.]

cāl-strŏn-bā'r ĭte, s. [Eng., &c. calcium, strontium, barite.]

Min.: A variety of Barite, from New York.

* cāl'-sў-dŏ̄ne, s. [CHALCEDONY.]

cāl'-thą, s. [Contracted from Gr. καλαθος (kalathos) = a goblet, on account of the form of the corolla.]

Bot.: A genus of herbaceous plants belonging to the Ranunculaceæ, distinguished from Ranunculus by the absence of an outer calyx and from Helleborus by the situation of its petals. Caltha palustris, the Marsh Marigold, is a stout herbaceous plant with hollow stems, large glossy roundish notched leaves, heart-shaped at the base, and conspicuous bright yellow flowers, each of which is composed of five roundish petals or sepals. It is common in Britain, and is also known as May-blobs. (Trans. of Bot.)

cal-trap, cal-throp, cal-trop, s. [A.S. caltrappe = a thistle; Fr. chausse-trape = star-thistle; Ital. calcatreppo, calcatreppolo = star-thistle; from calcare = to tread, and tribolo = a star-thistle, a steel-trap; Lat. tribulus = a caltrop, a thistle.]

1. Mil.: An instrument also called "crows-foot," formed of four iron spikes, three inches long, joined together at their bases, so that, when thrown down, one point always stands upwards. Used to obstruct the advance of cavalry and increase the difficulty of a ford.

CALTRAP.

"The ground about was thick sown with caltrops, which very much incommoded the shoeless Moors."—Dr. Addison: Account of Tangiers.

2. Her.: [CHEVAL-TRAPS.]

3. Bot.: The common name for Tribulus.

Water Caltrops: A common name for Trapa.

cal-trap-pyn, v.t. [From caltrap, caltrop, s. (q.v.).] To catch with a hook.

"Caltrappyn. Hamo."—Prompt. Parv.

cal-tum bo, cal-tum-bo, cal-tum'-bo, cal-tum-bo, s. [Kalumb, the native name.]

Med.: The root of a plant, Menispermum palmatum, a native of Mozambique, having a very bitter taste, and used as a tonic and antiseptic.

American calumba: The roots of Frazera Walteri, a North American biennial. (Lindley.)

cal-tum bine, s. [Eng. calumb(a), suffix -ine (Chem.).]

Chem.: The bitter principle extracted from the root of the Menispermum palmatum.

cal-tum-bo, s. [CALUMBA.]

cal-u-met, s. [Fr. calumet, from Lat. calamus = a reed; Fr. chalumeau; O. Fr. chalemel, from Low Lat. calamellus = a little reed.] A kind of pipe for smoking used by the North American Indians. The bowl is generally of stone, ornamented with feathers, &c. The calumet is the emblem of peace and hospitality. To refuse the offer of it is to make a proclamation of enmity or war, and to accept it is a sign of peace and friendship.

cal-um-ner, s. [Eng. calumn(y); -er.] A calumniator.

"[It was a] calumner of Lysimachus he promiseth he will not restrain to the."—Chevaeau's Religious's Appeal to the Bar's Reason, p. 38.

cal-um ni-ate, v.t. & i. [Lat. calumniatus, pa. par. of calumnior = to slander; calumnia = a slander; from calvo = to deceive.]

A. Trans.: To misrepresent falsely and maliciously the words or actions of another; to slander, to accuse falsely.

"He [a man] is a horrid trade of downright calumniating."—Bishop Patrick: Answer to the Jesuit, &c., p. 109.

†B. Intrans.: To spread calumnies about; to make false charges.

"Created only to calumniate. Was Cressid here?"—Shakesp.: Troil. & Cress., v. 2.

cal-um-ni-a-ted, pa. par. & a. [CALUMNIATE.]

cal-um ni-a-ting, pr. par., a., & s. [CALUMNIATE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: Slandering.

"Love, friendship, charity are subjects all,
To envious and calumniating time."
Shakesp.: Troil. & Cress., iii. 3.

C. As substan.: The act of slandering; slander, calumny.

cal-um-ni-a'-tion, s. [Lat. calumniatio = a slandering; from calumnior = to slander; calumnia = a slander.] The act of spreading a false and malicious misrepresentation of any person's actions or words: a false and malicious slander.

"That which we call calumniation, is a malicious and false representation of an enemy's words or actions, to an offensive purpose."—Aylffe.

cal-um'-ni-a-tor, s. [Lat. calumniator; from calumnior.] One who wilfully spreads any false and malicious calumny or misrepresentation of the actions or words of another; a slanderer.

"This, I know, you will laugh at as well as I do; yet I doubt not but many little calumniators and persons of sour dispositions will take occasion hence to besputter me."—Pope: Letter to Addison.

cal-um'-ni-a-tor-y, a. [Eng. calumniator; -y.] Pertaining to or containing slander; slanderous.

"Upon admission of this passage, as you yourselves have related it in your calumniatory information."—Montagu: Appeal to Cæsar, p. 17.

cal-um'-ni-ous, a. [Fr. calomnieux.] Falsely and maliciously misrepresenting one's words or actions; slanderous, calumniating.

"Virtue itself scapes not calumnious strokes."
Shakesp. Hamlet, i. 3.

"... warrants were out against him on account of a grossly calumnious paper of which the government had discovered him to be the author."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. v.

cal-um-ni-ous-ly, adv. [Eng. calumnious; -ly.] In a calumnious manner; after the manner of a calumniator.

"Dealing in the case so maincerely, and calumniously, in their informations."—Montagu: Appeal to Cæsar, p. 26.

cal-um-ni-ous-ness, s. [Eng. calumnious; -ness.] Calumny, slander.

"The bitterness of my style was plainness, not calumniousness."—Bp. Morton: Discharge of Imputations, &c., p. 227.

cal-um-ny, s. [Fr. calomnie; Lat. calumnia = a false accusation; from calvo = to deceive.] A false and malicious misrepresentation of the words or actions of another; slander, a false charge.

"Be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, Thou shalt not escape calumny."
Shakesp. Hamlet, iii. 1.

¶ It is frequently followed by upon.

"It is a very hard calumny upon our soil or climate, to affirm that so excellent a fruit will not grow here."—Sir W. Temple.

cal-ur-us, s. [Gr. καλός (kalos) = beautiful, οὐρα (oura) = a tail.]

Ornith.: A genus of birds belonging to the Trogon family, and tribe Fissirostres. The head is surmounted by an elevated crest, and the tail coverts excessively developed.

cal-va-ri-a, s. [CALVARY.]

Anat.: That portion of the cranium, or skull, which is above the orbits, temples, ears, and occipital protuberance. Sometimes also called calvarium.

Cal-va-ry, s. [From Lat. calvaria, †calvarium = the skull; calva = the bald scalp; calvus = bald, without hair. Calvary (Luke xxiii. 33), is the rendering of the "Hebrew," i.e. the Aramæan word Golgotha = the place of a skull. Cf. Mat. xxvii. 33, Mark xv. 22, John xix. 17.]

calvary-cross, s.

Her.: A charge representing the cross on Mount Calvary, with three steps, supposed to imply the three Christian graces, Faith, Hope, and Charity.

calve (l silent), v.i. & t. [Eng. calf; But kalven; Dan. kalve, Sw. kalfva; Ger. kalben.]

A. Intransitive:

1. Lit.: To bring forth a calf; to bear young. (Said of a cow.)

"Their bull gendereth, and faileth not; their cow calveth, and casteth not her calf."—Job xxi. 10.

¶ Applied also to other animals.

"Knowest thou the time when the wild goats of the rock bring forth? or canst thou mark when the hinds do calve?"—Job xxxix. 1.

* 2. Figuratively:

(1) To bring forth, bear. (Applied even to inanimate things.)

"The greasy clods now calv'd; now half appear'd
The tawny lion, pawing to get free
His hinder parts."
Milton: P. L., bk. vii.

(2) Of icebergs: To break off from a glacier which has reached deep water.

B. Trans.: To bear; to bring forth. (Applied contemptuously or reproachfully to human beings.)

"I would they were barbarians, as they are Though in Rome litter'd; not Romans as they are not,
Though calved in the porch o' th' capital."
Shakesp.: Coriol., iii. 1.

calv-ver, cal-ver, v.t. & i. [Etymology doubtful. Wedgwood suggests Scotch cullour or culler = fresh.]

A. Trans.: To cut salmon into thin slices, while fresh, and then pickle these.

"Calver as cannon, or other (s)alse."—Prompt. Parv.

"My foot-boy shall eat pheasants, calver'd salmons."—Ben Jonson: Alchemist, ii. 1.

"Provide me then chines fried, and the salmon calver'd."—Killigrew: Parson's Wedding (1664).

B. Intrans.: To bear being so sliced and pickled.

"His flesh [the grayling's], even in his worst season, is so firm, and will so easily calver, that in plain truth he is very good meat at all times."—Cotton: Complete Angler.

calv-er (l silent), s. [Eng. calve, v.; and suff. -er.] A cow with calf. (Scotch.) cal-ver-ed, pa. par. or a. [CALVER, v.] Sliced and pickled.

¶ Calver'd salmon is a dainty celebrated by all our old dramatists. "May's Accomplished Cook," if that be sufficient authority, gives an ample receipt for preparing it. It is to be cut in slices, and scalded with wine and water and salt, then boiled up in white-wine vinegar, and set by to cool; and so kept, to be eaten hot or cold (p. 354). It now means, in the fish trade, only crimped salmon. (Nares.)

Great lords, sometimes,
For a change leave calver'd salmon, and eat sprats."
Massinger: Guardian, iv. 2.

"... but even Prince George, who cared as much for the dignity of his birth as he was capable of caring for any thing but claret and calvered salmon, submitted to be Mr Morley."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

cal-ver-keys (eys as ēz), s. [CULVERKEYS.]

calves (l silent), s.pl. [CALF.]

"Like heifers, neither bulls nor calves."
Lloyd: Cherry & A Fragment.

calves foot, s. [CALF'S FOOT.]

calves-snout, s.

Bot.: A plant, so called from a fancied resemblance to the snout of a calf—Antirrhinum, better known as Snap-dragon, or Toad-flax.

calves-tongue, s.

Arch.: A sort of moulding, usually made at the caps and bases of round pillars, to taper or hance the round part to the square.

cal'-ville, s. [French, from Lat. calvus = bald, smooth-skinned.] A kind of apple.

calv-ing (l silent), pr. par., a., & s. [CALVE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: The act of giving birth to a calf.

"I heard of late of a cow in Warwickshire, which saw yeres had sixteen calfes, that is, foure at one time, twinnes, and twise twinnes . . ."—Holinshed: Description of Engl., bk. iii., ch. 4.

2. Naut.:

Of icebergs: The act of breaking or the state of being broken off a glacier when the latter reaches deep water. Glaciers tend to form on mountain tops when the temperature is low enough for the purpose. Then they gradually descend, new glacial material behind pressing them down. On reaching the ocean they are pushed into it, and finally they calve or give birth to icebergs, which have an independent existence of their own.

Cal-vin-ism, s. [Fr. calvinisme. From John Calvin, the celebrated reformer, born at Noyon, in Picardy, July 10th, 1509; died May 27th, 1564. For further details see definition.]

1. Theol.: The tenets of the above-mentioned John Calvin. Sometimes the term Calvinism comprehends his views regarding both theological doctrine and ecclesiastical polity; at others it is limited to the former, and specially to his views on the doctrines of grace. These are sometimes called the five points of Calvinism, or, more briefly, the five points; but this latter curt appellation is not sufficiently specific, for the rival system of Arminianism was also presented by the Remonstrants at the Synod of Dort in five points. Those of Calvinism are the following:—(1) Particular election. (2) Particular redemption. (3) Moral inability in a fallen state. (4) Irresistible grace. (5) Final perseverance. (For the rival Arminian five points see ARMINIAN.) Augustine, Bishop of Hippo, who was born in 354, and died in 430, held theological views essentially the same as those afterwards promulgated by Calvin. In addition to what may be called the doctrines of grace, Calvin held the spiritual presence of Christ in the Holy Eucharist, but not the doctrine of consubstantiation. He was thus essentially Zwinglian, and not Lutheran.

2. Eccles.: Calvin's views of Church government were essentially what are now called Presbyterian. He held also that the Church should be spiritually independent of the State, but was willing that the discipline of the Church should be carried out by the civil power. This last opinion, followed to its logical conclusion, involved him in heavy responsibility for the death of his Socinian antagonist Servetus, the capital punishment of whom for alleged heresy was approved of not merely by Calvin, but by the other reformers, not excepting the gentle Melanchthon. No one in those days seems to have clearly understood religious liberty.

3. Ch. Hist.: The work which first made this system known to the world was Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion, published in 1536. In August of the same year he visited Geneva, and, at the earnest request of Farel, its leading reformer, made it his residence. In 1538 both were expelled from the city, when Calvin, going to Strasburg, originated the French church there on the model which he deemed scriptural. In 1541 he was invited back to Geneva, and returning to it was the leading spirit there till his death, in 1564. Various Protestant churches adopted Calvin's theological views with his ecclesiastical polity; thus Knox carried both of these to Scotland, where the first Presbyterian General Assembly was held in 1560.

Bishop Burnet states that the 17th article of the Church of England is framed according to St. Augustine's doctrine, which, as stated, is essentially Calvinistic. The early reformers of the English Church mostly held his views of the doctrines of grace, which prevailed to the end of Queen Elizabeth's reign. Afterwards they imperceptibly declined. When the rival system of Arminius was brought to trial at the Synod of Dort, in Holland, in 1618, the English clerical representatives gave Calvinistic votes, notwithstanding which Arminianism took deep root in the English as in various other churches. Archbishop Laud was its warm friend and advocate, as were the High Church party generally, while Churchmen continued Calvinistic, a generalisation which still remains correct. The ecclesiastical polity of Calvin was embraced by the Puritan party, but never had a majority of the English people in its favour, and an attempt in the early days of the Long Parliament to set it up, though under the control of the civil government, was successful only to a limited extent, and for a brief period of time. Most of the clergymen whom the passing of the Act of Uniformity, in 1662, dissevered from the Church, were Calvinists.

Of the two great English revivalists of the eighteenth century, Whitfield was Calvinistic [CALVINISTIC METHODIST], and Wesley Arminian. [WESLEYAN.] The majority of the English Baptists are Calvinistic. All along, since the Reformation, the theological tenets and the ecclesiastical polity of Calvin have nearly always been dominant in Scotland, though the sterner features of both have almost imperceptibly been softened down.

"The delights arising from these objects were to be sacrificed to the cold and philosophical spirit of Calvinism, which furnished no pleasures to the imagination."—Warton: Note on Milton's Il Penseroso.

căl-vin-ĭst, s. [Fr. calviniste.] A follower of Calvin; one who adopts the theological teaching of Calvinism.

"The Calvinist is tempted to a false security, and sloth; and the Arminian may be tempted to trust too much to himself, and too little to God."—Burnet on the Articles, Art. 17.

căl-vin-ĭs'-tĭc, * căl-vin-ĭs'-tĭck, * căl-vin-ĭs'-tĭ-căl, a. [Eng. calvinist; -ic, -ical.] Pertaining to Calvin or Calvinism.

"... the petty states and republicks abroad, where the calvinistick discipline was adopted."—Warton: Hist. of Eng. Poetry, ii. 406.

Calvinistic Baptists, s. pl.

Ch. Hist. & Ecclesiol.: A sect of Baptists having registered places of worship in England.

Calvinistic Methodists, s. pl.

Ch. Hist. & Ecclesiol.: A section of the Methodists, distinguished by their Calvinistic sentiments from the ordinary Wesleyans, who are Arminian. Wesley and Whitfield, the colleagues in the great evangelistic movement which did so much spiritually and morally to regenerate England in the 18th century, differed with regard to the doctrines of grace, Wesley being Arminian, and Whitfield Calvinistic; the latter revival preacher may be looked on as the father and founder of Calvinistic Methodism. Other names, and specially that of Mr. Howell Harries, of Trevecca, should be mentioned in connection with it. In its distinctive form it dates from 1735, but did not completely sever its connection with the English Church till 1810. In government it is now Presbyterian. Its great seat is Wales.

* căl-vin-ĭze, v.t. [Eng. calvin; -ize.] To convert to Calvinism.

calv-ĭsh (l silent), a. [Eng. calf; -ish.]

1. Lit.: Pertaining to or like a calf.

2. Fig.: Silly, stupid.

"He was holden unworthy to be made a parish-priest, as having made a calvish answer."—World of Wonders (1656), p. 240.

căl-vĭt'-ĭ-ēş, s. [Latin, from calvus = bald.]

Physiol.: The term for the want or loss of hair; more particularly on the sinciput; baldness.

căl-vĭt-ў, s. [Fr. calvitie; Lat. calvities.] Baldness; absence of hair. [CALVITIES.]

căl-vŭs, a. [Lat. calvus = bald.] Bald.

călx (1), s. [Lat. calx, genit. calcis.]

1. Glass-making: Broken or refuse glass, which is restored to the pots.

2. Chem. & Min.: A kind of ashes or fine powder, remaining from metals, minerals, &c., after they have undergone calcination by the violent action of fire, and have lost all moisture.

"Gold, that is more dense than lead, resists peremptorily all the dividing power of fire; and will not be reduced into a calx, or lime, by such operation as reduces lead into it."—Digby.

Calx viva: Quicklime, or lime in its most caustic state.

Calx extincta: Slacked lime, or lime that has been quenched with water after it has been burnt.

Calcis aqua, or liquor: Limewater; a solution of lime in water.

călx (2), s. [Lat. = the heel.] The heel. Usually employed in the genitive, as os calcis = the heel bone, the calcaneum.

căl-ў-bĭte, s. [Gr. καλυβίτης (kalybites), dwelling in a hut.] One of a class in the Early Church who dwelt in huts.

căl-ў-cănth-ā'-ş̆ē-æ, s. pl. [From Mod. Lat. calycanthus; and fem. pl. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: An order of Rosal Exogens consisting of two genera. The species, which are shrubs, bear delightfully fragrant flowers, thrive in open loamy soil, and are propagated by layers.

căl-ў-căn'-thē-mŭs, a. [CALYCANTHEMY.]

Bot.: Having petaloid sepals.

căl-ў-căn'-thĕm-ў, s. [From Gr. κάλυξ (kalux), genit. κάλυκος (kalukos) = a calyx, and ἄνθεμον (anthemon) = flowery.] The conversion wholly or partially of sepals into petals. (R. Brown, 1874.)

căl-ў-cănths, s. pl. [CALYCANTHUS.]

Bot.: Lindley's English name for the Calycanthaceæ.

căl-ў-cănth ŭs, s. [Gr. κάλυξ (kalux) = a cup, a calyx, and ἄνθος (anthos) = a flower.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, the typical one of the family Calycanthaceæ. It consists of North American shrubs with opposite, oval, or ovate-lanceolate entire leaves, generally rough on the surface. There are but two species. C. floridus (Carolina All Spice) is a native of Carolina; C. chai, or Nobei (Japan All Spice), a native of Japan.

căl-ў-ş̆ĭ-flō'-rē-æ, s. pl. [Lat. calyx (genit. calycis), and flos (genit. floris) = a flower.]

Bot.: A natural order of gamopetalous diclinous epigynous dicotyledons included in Lindley's Campanal alliance. Herbs with alternate leaves, without stipules, and with flowers collected in heads; calyx superior, of five unequal divisions; corolla regular, funnel-shaped, with a five-divided limb; stamens, five thin filaments united, as well as the lower part of the anthers; ovary one-celled, style smooth, stigma capitate. The order occupies an intermediate space between Compositæ and Dipsaceæ, and comprises about twenty species, all natives of South America. (Treas. of Bot.)

căl-ў-ş̆ў'-ĭr-ă, s. [Gr. καλός (kalos) = beautiful; κέρας (keras) = a horn.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, the typical one of the order Calycereæ. They are small annual or perennial herbs, from four to eight inches high, but possess little interest for any but the botanist.

căl-ў-ş̆ēş, s. pl. [CALYX.]

căl-ў-ş̆ў-ĭ-flō'-ræ, s. pl. [Lat. calyx (genit. calycis), and flos (genit. floris) = a flower.]

Bot.: A sub-class of exogenous or dicotyledonous plants, characterised by having both calyx and corolla, petals separate and stamens attached to the calyx. (Treas. of Bot.)

† căl-ў-ş̆ў-ĭ-flō'-rŭs, a. [CALYCIFLORÆ.]

Bot.: Of or pertaining to the Calycifloræ.

căl-ў-ş̆ĭ-form, a. [Lat. calyx (genit. calycis), forma = form, shape.]

Bot.: In the form of a calyx; an epithet applied to the involucrum when it has the appearance of a calyx.

căl-ў-ş̆ĭn-ăl, căl-ў-ş̆ine, a. [Lat. calyx (genit. calycis) = a case, a bud; Gr. κελυφ (kelyph) = a seed-vessel, a calyx; suff. -al.]

Bot.: Of or belonging to a calyx; in the form of a calyx; an epithet applied to the scales or thorns which are on the calyx.

căl-ў-ş̆ĭ-ĭ-ŭm, s. [Gr. καλύκιον (kalukion) = a little cup, from the appearance of the reproductive organs.]

Bot.: A genus of Lichens belonging to the tribe Conothalmeæ.

† căl'-ў-cle (cle as cŏl), s. [Lat. calyculus, dim. of calyx (q.v.).]

Bot.: A row of small leaflets placed at the base of the calyx on the outside. A partial involucre containing but one, or perhaps two flowers. [CALYCULE.]

¶ The cut shows 1. Flower of Schœpfia with calycle at base; 2. Calycle of Schœpfia; 3. Calycle of Mallow.

CALYCLE

† căl-ў-cŏ'ĭd, a. [From Gr. κάλυξ (kalux) = a calyx, and εἶδος (eidos) = form.]

Bot.: Calyx like.

† căl-ў-cŏ'ĭd-ē-ŏŭs, a. [Gr. κάλυξ (kalux) = a calyx; εἶδος (eidos) = form, appearance.]

Bot.: Having the form or appearance of a calyx.

căl-ў-cō'-mĭs, s. [Gr. καλος (kalos) = beautiful; κόμη (komē) = hair.]

Bot.: A genus of Conothalmeæ, now called Acrophyllum (q.v.).

căl-ў-cō phŏr'-ĭ-dæ, s. pl. [From Gr. κάλυξ (kalux), genit. κάλυκος (kalukos) = a cup, and φορεω (phoreō) = to bear, to carry.]

Zool.: An order of Siphonophora (Oceanic Hydrozoa). They are transparent organisms, generally found floating on or near the surface in tropical and sub-tropical seas. They consist of a long stem with a bouy nae at the proximal, and swim by the rhythmical contraction of their nectocalyces or bells.

căl-ў-cŭ-lāte, căl-ў-cŭ-lāted, a. [Lat. calyculus, dim. of calyx (q.v.).] [CALYCULATE.]

cal-y-cŭle, s. [Lat. calyculus, dim. of calyx (q.v.).]

Bot.: A little calyx. A bundle or row of small bracts, which forms a verticil immediately beneath the calyx, and resembling an exterior calyx; example, the Pink. In the Potentilla the calycule is formed by the stipules united two by two, which are a dependence of the sepals.

cal-ym'-ma-tō, s. [Gr. κάλυμμα (kalumma) = a veil, a covering; καλύπτω (kaluptō) = to veil, cover.]

Paleont.: A genus of fossil Trilobites, occurring in the Silurian rocks. They appear to have possessed the power of rolling themselves up into a ball, as some recent allied genera do, for the purpose either of safety or of concealment. Calymene Blumenbachii is the well-known Dudley Trilobite.

CALYMENE BLUMENBACHII.

cal-y-mēn-i-dæ, s. pl. [From Mod. Lat. calymene (q.v.), and pl. suff. -idæ.]

Paleont.: A family of Trilobites. [CALYMENE.]

cal'-y-ōn, s. [CALION.]

¶ 1. Ord. Lang.: A hard, round stone. (Prompt. Parv.)

2. Masonry: Flint or pebble stone used in building walls.

cal-y-phy'-lum-y, s. [From Gr. κάλυξ (kalux), gent. καλυκος (kalukos) = a calyx, and φύω (phuō) = to bring forth, to produce.]

Bot.: Abnormal adhesion of the calyx to the corolla. (R. Brown, 1874.)

cal-yp-sō. Cal-yp-sō, s. [Gr. κάλυψις (kalupsis) = a covering, καλύπτω (kaluptō) = to cover, conceal.]

1. Mythol.: The goddess of silence, daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and Queen of Ogygia, who tried by every art to detain Ulysses on his way home from Troy.

2. Astron.: An asteroid, the fifty-third found. It was discovered by the astronomer Luther, on the 4th April, 1858.

3. Bot.: A genus of Orchids, found in North America. Calypso borealis is the most beautiful of northern orchids. It is a tuberous terrestrial plant, with one leaf and one flower only. The rose-coloured flower appears at the end of a slender sheathed stem. The leaf is thin, many nerved, either ovate or cordate. (Treas. of Bot.)

cal-yp'-tēr, s. [CALYPTRA.]

cal-yp-tō-blăs'-tic, a. [From Gr. καλυπτός (kaluptos) = covered, and βλαστος (blastos) = a sprout, shoot, or sucker.]

Zool.: Noting or pertaining to those Hydrozoa in which the nutritive or generative buds are provided with an external protective receptacle. (Allman.) calyptoblastic hydroids, s. pl.

Zool.: The hydroids above described. It comprehends the Sertularians and the Campanularians.

cal-yp-tō-lite, s. [Gr. καλύπτω (kaluptō) = to hide, conceal, suff. -lite (Min.) = Gr. λιθος (lithos) = a stone.]

Min.: The same as ZIRCON (q.v.).

cal-yp-tō-rhyn-chūs, s. [Gr. καλύπτω (kaluptō) = to hide; ῥύγχος (rhunchos) = a beak, or snout.]

Ornith.: A genus of birds of the Psittacidæ or Parrot family.

cal-yp-tra, s. [Gr. καλύπτρα (kaluptra); from καλύπτω (kaluptō) = to hide, cover.]

Botany:

1. Gen.: A hood-like body connected in some plants with the organs of fructification. It exists in some flowering plants and in mosses. Used specially for—

(1) A number of bracts united to cover the flower. Example, Pileanthus.

(2) A lid or operculum to the stamens. It may be made of consolidated sepals or petals. Examples: Eucalyptus, Eudesmia.

2. Spec.: The hood of an urn-moss, covering the top of the theca like a cup.

cal-yp-trm'-a, s. [Lat. calyptra; Gr. καλύπτρα (kaluptra) = a hood, covering.]

Zool.: A genus of Gasteropods, furnished with a patelliform shell, to the cavity of which a smaller conical one adheres, like a cup in a saucer. It is the typical genus of the family Calyptræidæ. The species are called Cup-and-Saucer Limpets. Tate estimates the known recent species at fifty and the fossil at thirty-one, the latter from the chalk, if not from the carboniferous formation on till now. They are called Bonnet Limpets.

cal-yp-træ-i-dæ, s. pl. [From calyptræa(a), and fem. pl. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of Gasteropods comprising, among other genera, Calyptræa and Crepidula of Lamarck.

cal-yp-trăn'-thēs, s. [From Gr. καλύπτρα (kaluptra) = a cover, as of a quiver (?), a woman's veil, and ἄνθος (anthos) = a flower.]

Bot.: A genus of Myrtaceæ. The species are from America. The flowers of Calyptranthes aromatica might be used for cloves.

cal-yp'-trāte, a. [Lat. calyptra; Gr. καλύπτρα (kaluptra); and Eng. suff. -ate.]

Botany:

1. Gen.: Having a veil or covering like a calyptra or hood.

"Such a calyx is operculate or calyptrate."—Balfour: Botany, p. 104.

2. Of a calyx: Bursting on one side at the period of falling. Example, Eschscholtzia. (Lindley.) cal-yp'-tri-form, a. [Lat. calyptra = a hood; forma = form.]

Bot.: Having the form or appearance of a calyptra or hood.

cal-ly-săc'-ci-ōn, s. [From Gr. κάλυξ (kalux) = a calyx, and σακκιον (sakkion) = a small bag.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, order Clusiaceæ (Guttifers). Only known species, Calysaccion longifolium. It is from India and China. The flower buds are very fragrant. They are used in India for dyeing silk yellow and orange.

cal-ys-tē'-gi-a, s. [Gr. κάλυξ (kalux) = a calyx, and στεγη (stegē) = a covering.]

Bot.: A genus of plants of the order Convolvulaceæ, containing about twelve or fourteen species, of which two are British—Calystegia sepium and C. soldanella, the former of which is the common Bindweed.

cal'-lyx, s. [Gr. κάλυξ (kalux) strictly = any covering, but used only of flowers and fruits, i.e. (1) a husk or shell, (2) the calyx or cup of a flower (Lat. calix = a cup), from καλύπτω (kaluptō) = to cover, to conceal.]

CALYX (1) FOXGLOVE, (2) PRIMROSE.

1. Bot.: The most outerly integument of a flower, consisting of several verticillate leaves, either united by their margins or distinct, usually of a green colour and of a ruder and less delicate texture than the corolla. (Lark, Lindley, &c.) When only one series of floral integuments is present, that single one is considered as a calyx, and not as a corolla. The divisions of a calyx are called sepals. A superior or adherent calyx is one not able to be separated from the ovary; an inferior or free one is actually separate. A calyculate calyx is one surrounded at the base by a ring of bracts. The term involucre (q.v.) may be used of a calyx as well as of a complete flower. A calyx is not the same as a perianth, the latter being a calyx and corolla combined, as in a tulip or an orchid, and not a solitary calyx. A common calyx is called an involucre (q.v.).

2. Zool.: The cup-shaped body of a Crinoid or that of a Torticella.

• cāl'-sōons, • cāl'-sōunds, s. pl. [O. Fr. calçons; Ff. calçon, calçons; Ital. calzoni; Sp. calzones, augment. of Ital. calze; Sp. calzas; Fr. chausses = hose, stockings, from Lat. calceus = a shoe, calx = a heel.] Drawers. (Sir T. Herbert.) (Webster.)

"The next that they weare is a smocke of callico, with ample sleeves, much longer than their armes; under this, a paire of calsoones of the same, which reach to their ancles."—Sandys' Travels, p. 66.

cām, • kăm, • kamme, a., adv., & s. [Gael., Ir., & Wel. cam = crooked.] [CAMBER.]

A. As adjective:

1. Lit.: Crooked, curved.

2. Fig.: Crooked in temper, perverse, cross, peevish. (Provincial.)

• B. As adv.: Wrong, out of the right course.

"This is clean kam — Merely awry."
Shirley: Coriolanus, iii. 1.

"Against the woall, the wrong way, clease contrary, quite kamme."—Cotgrave.

C. As substantive:

1. The projecting part of a wheel or curved plate, so shaped as to cause an eccentric or alternating motion of any required velocity or direction in another piece pressing against it.

2. A ridge or mound of earth. (Provincial.) (Wright.) cam-ball, s. & a.

¶ Cam-ball valve: A valve acted upon by a cam on the axis of a ball-lever, so that, as the float in a cistern, the cam may press against the stem of the valve and close it, preventing the ingress of water.

¶ Cam-gear wheeling:

Mach.: A certain arrangement of gearing.

cam-shaft, s.

Mach.: A shaft having cams or wipers for raising the pestles of stamping-mills. It is called also a tumbling-shaft or wallower. (Knight.) cam-wheel, s.

Mach.: A wheel so constructed as to move eccentrically, and cause an alternating or reciprocating motion in another part of the machine.

• cāme, pret of v. [COME.] (O. Eng. & Scotch.) Came.

1. Old English:

"Tho came the thridde dais ligt."
Story of Gen. & Exod., 114.

2. Scotch:

"The poor Highland body, Dugald Mahoney, came here a while syne. —Scott: Waverley, ch. lxiii.

• cām'-a-cā, s. [Low Lat. camaca, camuca; O. Fr. camocas; Mod. Gr. καμουχάς (kamouchas).] A kind of fine cloth.

"Your curtaines of camaca."
Sports of Low Degree, 888.

• cą-māl', s. [Ital. camaglio.]

¶ I. Ord. Lang.: A camel.

II. Technically:

1. Fabric: A capuchin, or short cloak, sometimes made of fur, but probably originally of camel's hair.

2. Mil. (Ancient Armour): A neck guard of chain-mail which was added to the basinet, or headpiece, in the time of Edward III.

Cam-ăl-dų-lēn'-si-ans, s. pl. [From Camaldoli or Campo Maldili, a desert spot on the lofty heights of the Apennine chain of mountains.]

Ch. Hist.: A monastic fraternity founded in 1023 by Romuald, an Italian, at the place described in the etymology. It still flourishes, especially in Italy. Some are cœnobites and others eremites.

 cām'-ō-mēl, * cām'-ō-mēlle, * cām'-ō-mile, * cām'-mō-mȳle, s. [CAMOMILE.]

cām-ar-ā (1), s. [From Gr. camára (kamara) = anything with an arched cover, a vaulted chamber.]

1. Bot. : A carpel.

2. Comm. : The hard, durable timber of Dipteryx odorata, a leguminous plant, a native of Guiana. (Treas. of Bot.) cām-ar-ā (2), s. [Native Guiana name.] The same as Arkawar Nutmeg. It is produced by Acrodictidium camara, a species of the Laurel order. It is considered in Guiana to be one of the most efficacious remedies in colic, diarrhœa, and dysentery. (Lindley.)

 cām-ō-ril-lō, s. [Sp. camarilla = a little room, dim. of camara = a chamber.]

1. The audience chamber or private room of a king.

2. A band or company of conspirators; a cabal, a clique. (Wright.)

cām-ar-lēn-gō, s. [Sp. camarlengo = a chamberlain (q.v.).] A high functionary chosen when the decease of a Pope is expected not to be far distant, to govern the Church during the interregnum, and to see that irregular practices and all foreign or personal influence shall be excluded from the election.

"If the Camerlengo has only moderate abilities, he is greater than the Pope, for he can make the Pope."—Times, Sept. 28, 1877

cą-mās'-ą-ą, s. [From North American Indian quamash, the name of the plant.]

Bot. : A genus of plants, order Liliaceæ. The bulbs of Camassia esculenta are eaten by the North American Indians.

cąm'-ą-yeū, cąm'-ą-i-eū, s. [CAMEO.]

1. [CAMEO.]

2. Painting : A term used where there is only one colour, and where the lights and shadows are of gold, wrought on a golden or azure ground. This kind of work is chiefly used to represent basso relievos. (Chambers.)

camb (1), s. [COMB.]

camb (2), s. [CAMBIUM.]

cām-bāyes, s. pl. [From Cambay, formerly an important seaport, on the gulf of the same name in India, lat. 22° 21 N., long. 72° 48 E.]

Fabrics : Cotton cloth made in Bengal, Madras, and other parts of India. (Knight.) cām'-bēr (1), s. [O.Fr. cambre = crooked. Cf. cam, a.]

1. (See the example.)

"Camber, a piece of timber cut arching, so as a weight considerable being set upon it, it may in length of time be reduced to a straight."—Mor. Mech. Exer.

2. Arch. : An arch on the top of an aperture or on the top of a beam.

3. Nautical :

(1) The curve of a ship's plank.

(2) The part of a dockyard where cambering is performed.

(3) A small dock in the royal yards, for the convenience of loading and discharging timber.

camber-beam, s.

Arch. : That which forms a curved line on each side from the middle of its length. All beams should, to some degree, be cambered, if possible; but the cambered beam is used in flats and church platforms, wherein, after being covered with boards, these are covered with lead, for the purpose of discharging the rain-water. (Gwilt.) camber keeled, a. Having the keel slightly arched upwards in the middle of the length, but not actually hogged.

camber-slip, s.

Bricklaying : A strip of wood with one edge curved equal to a rise of one inch in six feet. It is used for sinking the soffit lines of straight arches to give them a slight rise that they may settle straight. (Knight.)

 cām'-bēr (2), s. [CHAMBER.]

 camber-maid, s. A chambermaid.

cām'-bēr, v.t. & i. [CAMBER, s.]

1. Trans. : To make a beam camberwise or arching.

2. Intrans : To bend or curve camberwise.

cām-bered, pa. par. & a. [CAMBER, s.] Arched, curved. (Totten.)

cām'-bēr-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [CAMBER, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj. : (See the verb.)

C. As subst. : The act of making a beam cambered or arched. (Weale.) cām-bi-ąl, a. [Low Lat. cambialis; from cambio = to exchange.] Pertaining or relating to exchange.

cām'-bi-form, a. [From Lat. cambium (CAMB), and forma = form, shape.]

¶ Cambiform tissue :

Bot. Physiol. : Narrow, thin-walled, elongated succulent cells often found in connection with pave tubes in the structure of plants. They are called also permanent cambium. (Thomé.)

† cām'-bist, s. [Fr. cambiste; Sp. & Ital. cambista; from Lat. cambio = to exchange.] One skilled in the science of exchange; a billholder; a money-changer.

"... cambist is not only a word of legitimate derivation, but is also a term much wanted in the English language, as there is none other to express the same meaning except Exchanger, which seems too general and indefinite."—Kelly. Universal Cambist (prel. 1811).

 cām'-bis-try, s. [Eng. cambist; -ry.] The science of exchange of moneys, &c.

cām'-bi-ūm, s. [Lat. cambium = exchange, bartering; from cambio = to exchange, barter.]

Bot. : The viscid substance which appears, in the spring, between the wood and bark of exogenous trees when the new wood is forming, and again disappears as soon as the wood is completely formed. It re-appears whenever the plant is again called into growth, as at Midsummer, in those species which shoot twice a year.

cambium-sheath, s.

Bot. Physiol. : An annular layer of formative tissue separating the very young cortex of a plant from the subjacent tissue. (Thomé.)

 cām-blēt, s. [CAMLET.]

cām-bō ge, s. [GAMBOGE.]

cām-bō'-di-ą, s. [Cambodja, or Cambodia, in the Eastern Peninsula, from which much of the gamboge of commerce is obtained.]

Bot. : An old genus of plants, order Clusiaceæ (Guttiferæ). It is now merged in GARCINIA (q.v.).

 cām'-bōk, s. [CAMMOCK.]

cām-bōō se, s. [CABOOSE.]

 cām'-brą-sine, s. [CAMBRIC.] A sort of fine linen resembling cambric, made in Egypt.

Cām'-brāy, † Cām'-brāi, s. & a. [Altered from Camaracum, the Roman name of the city.]

A. As subst. : A city of France, department of the Nord, lat. 50 10 N. and long. 3° 14 E.

B. As adj. : Brought from or in any way pertaining to the city described under A.

Cambray stone, s.

Min. : A name for Moss Agate, or Mocha-stone.

cām'-brāi, * cām-mēr-ell, s. [CAMBER.] A piece of bent wood, by which butchers hang up carcases of slaughtered animals.

Cām'-bri-ąn, a. & s. [Lat. Cambria = Wales.]

A. As adjective :

I. Ord. Lang. : Of or belonging to Wales.

"Him answer'd then his loving mate and true,
But more discreet than he, a Cambrian one."
Spenser. The Scottish Nymphs.

II. Geol. : Of or belonging to the series of rocks described under B II. (See the terms Cambrian formation, group, or system.)

B. As substantive :

* I. Ord. Lang. : A native of Wales.

II. Geology :

1. Formerly : In 1835 Sedgwick gave this name to some much disturbed and apparently unfossiliferous old strata, until then known as "Grauwacke," which he had traced out in Cumberland and North Wales. Just previously, Murchison had fixed the term "Silurian" to a series of fossiliferous deposits in Shropshire and Wales, known by him afterwards as the Ludlow, Wenlock, Llandovery, Caradoc, Llandeilo, and Lingula groups. These were all regarded as younger than, and lying above, Sedgwick's "Cambrian," save the position, however, of the Bala limestone (equivalent to the "Caradoc Sandstone" of Shropshire) was mistaken, and consequently the boundary-line provisionally fixed by the two observers was misplaced. Fossils characteristic of the "Silurian" were afterwards found in strata thus placed in the "Cambrian" series, and hence the latter name became limited to the lowest beds. The nomenclature was generally adopted, and Sedgwick, renewing his work, criticised it. A better knowledge of the fossils has of late modified the classification, as given below.

2. Now : As defined by Hicks and others the Cambrian is a thick series of slates, schists, sandstones, and conglomerates, with both intruded and intercalated igneous rocks, linked by similarity of fossils, and contrasted with the Silurian series. They occur in Wales and elsewhere, contain many Trilobites and Brachiopods, with other fossils, and are also known as: 1. Tremadoc Slates (uppermost); 2. Menevian beds and Lingula-flags; 3. Menevian beds and Harlech grit; 4. Lingula group, consisting of Harlech grit and Llanberris slates. The Geological Survey (following Murchison) limit the term to the Longmynd Group; but others (after Sedgwick) include all Murchison's "Lower Silurian" (Bala and Llandeilo groups) in the "Cambrian."

Cambrian formation :

Geol. : The series of rocks described under B. II.

Cambrian group :

Geol. : Lyell's name for the Cambrian rocks belonging to what is more commonly termed the Cambrian formation, the word group in this sense now tending to obsolescence.

Cambrian system : The same as Cambrian formation and Cambrian group (q.v.).

cām'-brie, * cām-brick (1), s. & a. [In Dut. Kamerijck; Ger. kammertuch; Fr. toile de Cambrai; from Cambray, a town in France, where it was originally made.]

A. As substantive :

1. A kind of very fine white linen cloth.

"He hath ribbons of all the colours of the rainbow; inkles, caddises, cambricks, and lawns."—Shakesp. Winter's Tale, iv. 3.

2. A kind of fabric made of hard spun cotton yarn, of different colours, in imitation of linen cambric. (Webster.)

B. As adj. : Pertaining to or made of the material described in A 1.

"And cambrick handkerchiefs to ward the smg' fog."

 cām'-brick (2), s. [CAMMOCK.]

cām-būr'-ą, cām-bur-ą, s. [Brazilian chambury.]

Bot. : A plant, Carica dioïcia, order Papayaceæ (Papayads). It is regarded, where it grows, as a deadly poison.

cām'-buy, s. [A Brazilian word (?).] The native name of a fruit derived from a species of Eugenia. It is said by Von Martius to be excellent for desserts.

Cām-den-i-ąn, a. [From William Camden, founder, in 1622, of the Professorship mentioned in the example.] Founded by Camden.

"He was Camdenian Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford."—Macaulay. Hist. ch. xiv.

cām dū-l, s. [From Gael. cam = crooked, and dubh = black.] A kind of trout. (Jamieson.) cāme, pret. of v. [COME.]

cāme (1), s. [COMB.] (S. & E. Scot. & N. Eng.)

cāme (2), s. [CAMES.]

A. As substantive :

I. Ord. Lang. : The name given to two animals, the Camelus dromedarius and C. bactrianus (CAMELUS), the former generally called the Arabian Camel, or simply the Camel, and the latter the Bactrian Camel.

1. The Arabian species, which has but one hump on its back. Of this there are two varieties: Variety 1 is large and full of flesh, and able on an emergency to carry burdens of 1 000 lbs. weight, though 500 or 600, or at most 800 lbs., are a more appropriate load. The soft-cushioned foot is admirably adapted to support the animal in traversing the desert, and its stomach can be converted into water-tanks, from which a supply of the precious fluid can be obtained when the animal has no other method of slaking its thirst. So admirably is it adapted for the arid wastes, that it has been called the ship of the desert. Variety 2 is leaner and of a smaller size. It is often called the Dromedary (from Gr. δρομας (dromas) = running), the name being given because of its swiftness. It is unfit to bear heavy burdens, but will go one hundred miles a day. It is generally used for riding by men of quality.

2. The Bactrian species, which is stouter and more muscular than the Arabian Camel, from which it differs in having two humps on its back.

II. Technically:

1. Naut. (Pl.): Hollow cases of wood, constructed in two halves, so as to embrace the keel, and lay hold of the hull of a ship on both sides. They are first filled with water and sunk, in order to be fixed on. The water is then pumped out, when the vessel gradually rises, and the process is continued until the ship is enabled to pass over a shoal or sill. Similar camels were used at Rotterdam about 1600.

2. Stocking frames: A bar mounted upon four wheels, and capable of being drawn forward and backward through a small space. Upon it are mounted the jacks with their springs, and the slur-bar upon which traverses the slur by which the jacks are actuated successively. (Knight.)

B. As adjective: (See the compounds).

cameleon-mineral, s. [Chameleon-mineral.]

căm'-ĕl-ĭ-dæ, s. pl. [From Lat. camelus (q.v.) and fem. pl. suffix -idæ.]

1. Zool.: A family of Ruminants, containing the Camels and Llamas. The dentition differs from that of the typical Ruminantia. In the upper jaw there are three teeth on each side in front separated by slight intervals. There are a conical incisor, a canine, and a premolar. Then after a gap the rest of the molars follow. There are no horns. The lower surface of the foot is applied to the ground. There are two toes enclosed in skin, and the hoofs are reduced almost to the size of nails. There are two recent genera—Camelus in the eastern hemisphere, Auchenia in the western.

2. Palæont.: Various extinct genera of Camelidæ have been found in the Lower Miocene and in the Pliocene of North America. In the eastern world no species has been found earlier than the Upper Miocene (?) of the Sewalik hills on the flanks of the Himalayas. It is a genuine Camelus, C. sivalensis.

căm-ĕl-ĭ'-nə, s. [Lat. From Gr. χαμαι (chamai) = on the ground, and λινον (linon) = flax.]

Bot.: A small genus of cruciferous plants (Brassicaceæ), containing two or three European and North American species. They are dwarf annual or perennial herbaceous plants, with stem-clasping leaves, and terminal racemes of yellow flowers. The most interesting species is the Camelina sativa, a doubtful inhabitant of Britain, and sometimes called Gold of Pleasure. It is cultivated in some parts of the Continent for the fibre and oil obtainable from its seeds, which are sometimes imported into this country under the name of Dodder-seed. By pressure they yield a clear yellow-coloured oil, something like linseed-oil, and the residual cake has been recommended as food for cattle. The fibre is used in many parts for making brooms cə-mĕl'-ĭ-ə, s. [From Camelli, a Jesuit, by whom the flower was introduced from the East.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, order Ternstromiaceæ (Theads). It is very near akin to Thea, which contains the tea plant; indeed, some botanists combine the two genera into one. The native countries of the Camellias are the eastern side of the Himalaya mountains, Cochin-China, China, Japan, and the Eastern Islands. Camellia japonica, said to have been introduced into Britain by Robert James, Lord Petre, is the original whence have been derived all the numerous varieties now cultivated in Britain. It has broad shining leaves and red flowers. C. maliflora, the Apple-blossomed Camellia, may be a variety of the last named plant. C. reticulata, a very fine species, has flowers of a deep rose colour, sometimes six inches across. The seeds of the Chinese C. oleifera yield a valuable oil.

cə-mĕl'-ō pard, căm-ĕl'-ō-pard, s. [From Lat. camelus = a camel; and pardus = a panther. He is so named because he has a neck and head like a camel; he is spotted like a pard, but his spots are white upon a red ground. (Trevoux.) Cf. leo-pard.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A precious stone carved in relief, such as the onyx or agate. The stone used should have two or more layers of different colours, and the art consists in cutting away portions of the stone so as to expose these different colours in the various parts of the work to which they are appropriate. Shells, especially the strombus or stromb shell, a genus of wing shells, are frequently used for the same purpose.

căm'-ər-ə (1), s. [Ital. kamera = a chamber; Lat. camera = a vault, Gr. καμάρα (kamara), anything with an arched cover, . . . a vaulted chamber.] [Chamber.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Any instrument having a dark chamber, and especially the camera-obscura and the camera-lucida (q.v.).

2. Law: The judge's chamber in Sergeants' Inn.

¶ To hear a cause in camera: To hear a cause privately in the judge's own room instead of in open court

3. Naut.: A kind of ship used in the Black Sea.

camera-lucida, s. [In Ger. kamera lucida; from Lat. camera (q.v.), and lucida = containing light, full of light, bright, opposed to obscura = dark.] An instrument invented by Dr. Woolaston in 1804 or 1807, and subsequently improved by Professor Amici of Modena. Its design is to produce on a plane surface such a representation of a landscape, an object of natural history, or other visible thing, as may enable one to delineate it with accuracy. In Dr. Woolaston's instrument there is a glass prism of such a form that its base or its apex (it is the same with both) has the following angles: 90°, 67½, 135°, and 67½. An object placed at a proper distance, in a horizontal direction, from one of the plains enclosing the right angle, will send forth rays, which in their passage through the prism will be twice totally reflected, and finally reaching the observer's eye, placed near one of the acute angles and looking downwards, will enable it to see the object of which it is in quest depicted on a surface placed in proper focus beneath. It is difficult for the eye, however, to take in both the figure and the point of the pencil at the same moment. In Professor Amici's instrument, designed to cure this defect, there is a rectangular glass prism (A C B) with one of the perpendicular faces (A B) turned, as in the former case, to the object (O) which is designed to be depicted, whilst the other (A C) is at right angles to an inclined plane of glass (I N). The rays O D proceeding from the object O are slightly refracted at D, totally reflected at F, again refracted at G, and partially reflected at E; finally reaching the eye at E, &c., making it see the image at O'. The point of the pencil is seen at the same time quite distinctly through the inclined glass plate, and there is thus every facility for tracing the picture correctly.

camera obscura, s. [In. Ger. kamera obskura; Fr. chambre obscure; Ital. camera oscura. From Lat. camera (q.v.), and obscura, f. adj. = obscure, dark.] An instrument of which, as the name imports, the essential feature is a dark chamber. It was invented, according to some, by Friar Bacon, about the 13th century; but is generally attributed to Baptista Porta, who published a work at Antwerp in 1560 in which it was described. If in the window of a chamber from which light is everywhere rigidly excluded a hole is made, about an inch in diameter, the rays streaking in will depict on the opposite wall a rude picture of the moving panorama seen in the street, or any other objects which may rest or pass before it. The delineation is, however, very shadowy, but may be made better defined by placing a double convex lens in the aperture and a sheet of paper in proper focus for the picture. The lens will reverse the figures, which may be put right again by making the rays fall on a mirror at an angle of 45°. Brewster discovered that the images became very bright by receiving them on the silvered back of a mirror. In the room now described are all the essentials of a camera obscura, and all that is needful is to imitate the procedure now described in an artificial "camera" or "room" made small enough to be portable. For the walls may be substituted a rectangular wooden box, formed of two parts sliding in each other, like the joints of a telescope, so as to adjust the focus to bodies more or less distant. A tube with a lens is fixed in one side of it, and is fitted to the object to be represented. The rays entering fall on a mirror sloped at an angle of 45°, which reflect them upwards to the observer's eye. It is convenient that they may be made to pass through a horizontal plate of glass, on which tracing paper may be placed so as to enable one to draw the figure if he be so disposed, but now this is generally done not by the hand but by photography (q.v.). A lid to the box is of use in ridding the observer of superfluous light.

There are other forms of camera. One with a triangular prism which acts both as condensing lens and mirror, and casts downwards on a table or screen a representation of the surrounding scene or landscape. Such an instrument placed on a hill in a city, and so adjusted that more or less distant objects may be brought into focus, presents a beautiful panorama of the streets with their moving population.

cām-ēr-ō-nĭ-an, a. & s. [Called after the Rev. Richard Cameron, a noted Scotch Presbyterian Covenanter and field preacher, who, entering the little town of Sanquhar, in Dumfriesshire, on the 22nd June, 1680, boldly issued a proclamation renouncing his allegiance to Charles II., and declaring him deposed for breach of covenants, tyranny, and other alleged crimes. Mr Cameron was killed in a conflict with the military at Airdsmoss, in Kyle, and those with him slain, taken, or dispersed. His followers became a separate denomination soon after the revolution of 1688, and developed into the Reformed Presbyterians. [REFORMED PRESBYTERIANS.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining to or in any way connected with the above-mentioned Richard Cameron or his followers.

¶ Cameronian regiment: The 26th of the British army. [B.]

"The Earl of Angus was able to raise a body of infantry, which is still, after the lapse of more than a hundred and sixty years, known by the name of the Cameronian Regiment."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

B. As substantive:

Ch. Hist.: A follower of the Rev. Richard Cameron. At the time of his death, his adherents had not separated from their Presbyterian brethren. They did so, however, after the Revolution of 1688, and became a distinct denomination. Though in certain respects they disapproved of the settlement then made, yet they considered it a vast improvement on that of the preceding Stuart dynasty, and gave it active support. The government of William and Mary, in consequence, when in some danger from the Jacobites, raised two regiments from the Cameronians, one of which (that mentioned above) still remains part of the British army. cām-ȳr, a. [CAM.] Curved. (Scotch.)

Camyr-nosed: Flat nosed. (Scotch.) The same as CAM-NOSED.

cā-mōtsed, cā-mūsed, a. [Mid. Eng. camous; -ed.] Flattened (applied only to the nose); pug nosed.

"Though my nose be camus'd, my lips thick."
B. Jonson: Mad shepherd.

cā-mōte lȳ, adv. [Mid. Eng. camous; -ly.] So as to be flatly nosed; awry.

"[illegible] nose some dele bolsed,
And camously crokked."
Skelton: Poems, p. 186.

camp, s. [A.S. camp; Fr. camp; Ital. & Sp. campo; Lat. campus = a field.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

*(1) A field, a plain, a level surface.

(2) The same as II. 1.

"[illegible] shall one carry forth without the camp."—Lev. xvi. 27.

"Beyond the limits of his camps and fortresses he could scarcely be said to have a part). —Macaulay: Hist. Engl., ch. i.

*(3) A division of a settlement.

"And the children of Israel shall pitch their tents, every man by his own camp . . ."—Numb. i. 52.

2. Figuratively:

*(1) Applied to any level surface, even to the sea, as a plain.

"To search all corners of the watery camp."
Sylvester: Du Bartas.

*(2) The army or number of persons encamped together in tents or other temporary lodgings.

"Both camps approach, their bloody rage doth rise."
Sylvester: Du Bartas.

"Dismiss thy camp."—Marlowe: Mass. of Paris, ii. 1.

*(3) An army in the field

"[illegible] and in this situation, carrying more show than real force with it, the camp arrived at Boston."—Hume: History of England, v. 310.

(4) Military service, "the field."

*(5) A multitude, a host

II. Technically:

1. Mil.: The space occupied by an army halted with tents pitched.

(1) Old British Camp: A camp not angular

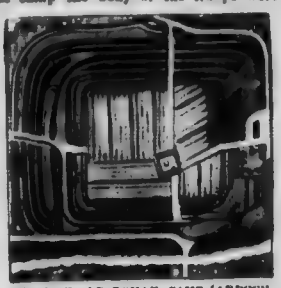
PLAN OF OLD BRITISH CAMP (CARR CARADOC, SHROPSHIRE).

occurring in England is, as a rule, of British origin; one with angles is presumably Roman.

(2) Old Roman Camp: A Roman encampment was, as a rule, a square, each side of it 2,150 Roman or 2,077½ English feet. Each of the sides had a gate. The principia, or principal street, ran from side to side, and quite bisecting each of them. In the rear of it was another one parallel to the first. Behind this, part of the allied forces were encamped. In the centre, between the two streets, were the quarters of the prætor commanding and his staff. Between the principia and the front of the camp the body of the troops were encamped. A street called quintana ran parallel to the others through the centre of this main part of the camp, and five streets crossed it at right angles.



PLAN OF OLD ROMAN CAMP (ARDOCH, PERTHSHIRE).

(3) Modern Field Camp: If not near the enemy, infantry are distributed on dry ground, the cavalry near water, the artillery near good roads, the hospital and transport in rear. If near the enemy, they are arranged in order of battle. Sloping, grassy land, with no brushwood, affords the best site, which is selected by the quarter-master general's department. Infantry: frontage, that of the battalion in line, or half that space; tents in lines at right angles to front, one row for each company. Cavalry: four rows of tents, horse-lines between the rows. Artillery: guns in line in front, then horse-lines, wagons, and men's tents. In each case kitchens, officers' tents, and regimental baggage in rear of all.

(4) Camp of Instruction: A camp, either temporary or permanent, for the purpose of hardening soldiers and accustoming them to field duty.

(5) Intrenched camp: A space of ground large enough to contain an army, and protected by a chain of permanent or temporary detached works.

2. Agric.: A mound of earth under which potatoes and other vegetables are stored, as a protection against frost.

¶ Compounds of obvious signification: Camp-bedstead, camp-boy, camp-fire, and camp-followers.

camp bed, s. A small light cot or bedstead, generally of iron, for the use of military men or travellers.

Arch.: A ceiling in which the marginal portion is sloping, following the line of the rafters, while the mid portion is level.

camp-chair, s. A form of folding chair adapted to be carried by a pedestrian, or packed away in an ambulance or wagon when on the march. [FOLDING-CHAIR.]

camp-fever, s.

Med.: The name popularly given to all those forms of fever which occur during a campaign, when large bodies of men are camped out and huddled together in a limited space, without a proper regard to the laws of sanitation and to the necessary supply of pure air, water, and food. The fever most likely to occur under such circumstances would be typhus, malignant and common, typhoid, intermittent (ague), dysentery, diarrhœa, &c.

camp-fight, s. The decision of any dispute by combat; a trial by arms.

"For their trial by camp-fight, the accuser was, with the peril of his own body, to prove the accused guilty."—Hakewill.

camp-kit, s. A box, with its contents, for containing soldiers' cooking and mess utensils, such as the camp-kettle, plates, &c.

camp-meeting, s. A religious meeting held in an encampment.

camp-mill, s. A mill adapted for the use of an army, to grind grain on the march or in camp. It is carried on a wagon or running-gear, and is sometimes driven by the wheels in travelling; sometimes by a sweep operated by horses or men after the wheels are anchored or sunk in the ground.

camp-shedding, s.

Hydraulic Engineering: A piling erected at the foot of an embankment to prevent the out-thrust or the washing by the current or waves. It consists of guide piles exteriorly, against which are placed wale-pieces, which are horizontal timbers. Within these are driven vertical planks of the nature of pile-sheeting. (Knight.) camp-stool, s. A chair whose frame folds up into a small compass for convenience of packing or carriage. Camp-stools were known in ancient Egypt, and were constructed in a manner similar to ours.

camp-stove, s. A light sheet-iron stove, specially arranged with a view to portability, and adapted for heating a tent or hut, and for cooking purposes.

camp-table, s. A table adapted to fold into a small space for transportation.

camp-vinegar, s. A mixture of vinegar with cayenne pepper, soy, walnut catchup, anchovies, and garlic.

camp (1), v.t. & i. [Camp, s.]

A. Trans.: To lodge an army in tents.

"Now troops can be landed at the port in the morning, and encamped here ere darkness falls."—Daily Telegraph, March 28, 1885.

B. Intransitive:

1. Lit.: To pitch tents; to lodge in tents.

"We boldly camp beside a thousand soil."
Pope: Homer's Iliad, bk. xviii. ver. 7.

¶ To camp out: To lodge in a tent away from houses in the open country.

*2. Fig.: To rest.

"The great granite years, which camp in the ledges in the cold day."—Ask iii. 17.

cām-paga-a (pagaa as pan-ya), s. [Ital. campagna; from Lat. campania.] [Campaign.]

1. Gen.: An open, level tract of country.

2. Spec.: The level district in Italy near Rome. [Champaign.]

cām-paga-ol (paguol as pan-yōl), s. [Fr. campagnol; from campagne = field; Ital. campagnuolo.]

Zool.: A small species of vole, called also the Meadow-mouse, Arvicola arvalis or agrestis, which is very destructive to roots and seeds in fields and gardens.

cām-paign' (g silent), cām-pāin', s. [Fr. campagne; Sp. campaña; Ital. campagna; Lat. campania.]

* 1. Ord. Lang.: A large open tract of country without hills

2. Mil.: Those operations of armies which terminate in a decisive result, after which follows a temporary cessation of hostilities or the conclusion of peace.

"For I am sure I am fitter to direct a campaign than to manage your Houses of Lords and Commons."—Hiresmity: Hist. Eng., ch. xv

3. Metal.: The period during which a furnace is continuously in operation. (American.)

† cām-paign' (g silent), v.i. [Campaign, s.] To serve in the field with an army.

". . . the officers who campaigned in the late rebellion . . ."—Sir R. Musgrave: History of the Irish Rebellion, p. vi.

cām-paign'-ēr (g silent), s. [Eng. campaign; -er.] One who serves in a campaign, a soldier.

"Both horse and rider were old campaigners."—Smollett: Expedition of Humphry Clinker.

cām-paign'-ing (g silent), pr. par. & s. [Campaign, v.]

A. As pr. par. (See the verb.)

B. As subst.: The act of serving with an army in the field.

* cām-pā'-na, s. [Low Lat. campana = a bell in Sp. & Ital. The flower is also called campana, from the shape of the flowers.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A bell, especially one for a church

2. Bot.: The pasque flower.

"Campana here be crops, ascented wondrous good."
Drayton: Polyolb., s. 1.

cām-pā-nal, a. & s. [From Low Lat. campana = a bell; and suff. -al.]

A. As adjective:

Bot.: Pertaining to the genus Campanula, as "the Campanal alliance."

B. As subst. (Pl. Campanals): The English name given by Lindley to his alliance Campanales (q.v.)

cām-pan á-ĕæ, s. pl. [From Low Lat. campana = a bell, and pl. m. or f. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: Campanals, an alliance of plants, epigynous Exogens, containing dichlamydeous monopetalous flowers and an embryo with little or no albumen. Lindley places in it the orders Campanulaceæ, Lobeliaceæ, Goodeniaceæ, Stylidiaceæ, Valerianaceæ, Dipsaceæ, and Asteraceæ (q.v.).

† cām-pā'ne, s. [Lat. campana = a bell.]

Her.: A bell, or bell-shaped vessel borne on coat-armour.

† cā.n.a pā'nod, s. [Lat. campana = a bell.]

Her: Furnished with or bearing bells.

cām-pan-ē'-rā, s. [Sp.]

Zool.: The Bell-bird, a native of Brazil.

† cām pān'-i form, a. [Lat. campana = a bell; forma = form, shape.]

Bot.: Bell shaped: an epithet applied to flowers which resemble a bell in shape.

cām-pan-i-lē, s [Ital. & Low Lat. campanile = a bell-tower, steeple; campana = a bell.] A tower for the reception of bells, principally used for church purposes, but now sometimes for domestic edifices. The campanile at Cremona is very celebrated, being 396 feet high. That at Florence, by Giotto, is 267 feet high, and 45 feet square. The most remarkable of the campaniles is that at Pisa, commonly called the "Leaning Tower." It is cylindrical in form, and surrounded by eight stories of columns, placed over one another, each having its entablature. The height is about 150 feet to the platform, whence a plumb-line lowered falls on the leaning side nearly thirteen feet outside the base of the building. (Gwilt.)

* cām-pan-il-i form, a. [Ital. campanilla = a little bell: dimin. of Lat. campana = a bell; forma = shape, form.] Bell-shaped.

cām-pan-il'-ō-gist, s. [Eng. campanolog(y); -ist.] One skilled in the science of campanology or bell-ringing.

cām-pan-il'-ō-gy, s. [Lat. campana = a bell, and Gr. λογος (logos) = a treatise, discourse.] The science of bell-ringing; a treatise on bell ringing cām-pān-u la, s. [Low Lat. campanula = a little bell, dim. of campana = a bell.]

Bot.: The Bell-flower, so called from the shape of its flowers. An extensive genus of herbaceous plants, giving the name to the order Campanulaceæ. Campanula rapunculus, Rampion, is much cultivated for the roots, which are boiled tender and eaten hot with sauce, or cold with vinegar and pepper. Of the British species C. latifolia is the finest; the flowers are large and blue, or (in the Scottish woods) sometimes white. The best known species is C. rotundifolia, the Harebell, or Blue-bell of Scotland. All the foregoing species are British. A foreign one, Campanula pinnata, is said by the Japanese to be a tonic.

cām-pān-u-lā'-ē-æ, s. pl. [Lat. campanula, and fem. pl. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: A natural order of plants, chiefly natives of the north of Asia, Europe, and North America. More than 300 species of this family are known, of which more than 60 are indigenous or cultivated in Britain.

cām-pān-u-lār'-i-a, s. [Low Lat. campanula = a little bell.]

Zool.: The type genus of the family Campanulariidæ, in which the cup-shaped hydrotheca are borne at the end of ringed stalks. The polypites bear a circle of tentacles below the conical proboscis.

cām-pan u-lā-ri i-dæ, s. pl. [From Mod. Lat. campanularia; fem. pl. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of calyptoblastic Hydroids cām-pān u lār'-i-da, s. pl. [From Mod. Lat. campanularia, (q.v.), & neut. pl. suff. -ida.]

Zool.: An order of hydroid Zoophytes. They are closely allied to the Sertularida, but their hydrotheca, with their contained polypites, are supported on compound stalks, and are terminal, while those of the Sertularida are sessile or subsessile and posteriorly cām-pān'-u lāte, a. [Low Lat. campanulatus, from campanula = a little bell, dim. of campana = a bell.]

Bot. &c.: Having the shape or form of a bell, bell-shaped.

cām-pān u lī'-na, s. [Low Lat. campanula = a little bell; neut. pl. suff. -ina.]

Zool.: A genus of calyptoblastic Hydroids, the typical one of the family Campanulinidæ. There are three species. Stem simple or branched rooted; cells pointed above; polypite cylindrical, with webbed tentacles. Reproduction by free medusa-buds, single in each capsule. (Gosse. & Hincksey.) cām-pān u lin'-i dæ, s. pl. [From Mod. Lat. campanulina, the type: and fem. pl. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of sertularian or calyptoblastic Hydroids, with cyathiform cells, stalked; polypes long, cylindrical, with a small conical proboscis.

* cam-par, s. [Camper (2).]

Camp' bell ite (p silent), s. A member of a denomination founded by two Baptist ministers of Kentucky, Thomas and Alexander Campbell. The Campbellites style themselves Disciples of Christ, and are also called New Lights.

cāmp-gōll'-ing, s. [Mid. Eng. camb = crooked, curved, and ceiling.]

Arch.: A ceiling whose form is curved inwardly

Cām-pē'a-chy, cām' peach-y, s. & a. [From the Gulf of Campeachy, in Mexico whence the wood is imported.]

campeachy-wood, campeach-wood, s. The red dye-wood better known by the name of Logwood, obtained from Hæmatoxylon Campechianum

cām-pē-phēag-a, s. [Gr. κάμπη (kampē) = a caterpillar; φαγειν (phagein) = to eat

Ornith.: A genus of birds belonging to the Lanidæ or Shrike family. It is the typical one of the sub-family Campephagæ (q.v.).

cām-pē-phā-ji-næ, s. pl. [From Mod. Lat. (from Gr.) campephag(a) (q.v.), and Lat. fem. pl. suff. -inæ.] Ornith.: A sub-family of Amphibolous (Caterers). They are found chiefly in the warmer parts of the Old World. None are British.

† cāmp-ēr (1), s. [Camp (1), v.] One who encamps or lodges in a tent in the field.

cāmp-ēr (2), * cam-par, s. [Camp (2), s.] A football-player.

* cām-pēs-trāl, * cām pēs tri-ăn, * [O. Fr. campestre; Fr. champêtre; from Lat. campestris = pertaining to the field, campus = the field.] Growing in the fields or country, wild.

cām-phāte, s. [Eng. camph(or), and suff. -ate.]

Chem.: [Camphoric Acid.]

cām-phēn'e, cām phi ne, s. [Eng. camph(or), and suffix -ene (Chem.).]

Chem.: $C_{10}H_{16}$. A crystalline hydrocarbon, obtained by the action of sodium stearate or acetate on a solid compound of HCl and turpentine.

cam-phor-ic, a. [Courbary.]

cam-phic, a. [Eng. camphor); -ic.] Pertaining to camphor.

camphic acid, s.

Chem. $C_{10}H_{16}O_4$. Obtained by heating camphor with alcoholic soda solution in sealed tubes to 170°–180° along with camphol. The solution is neutralised with $HgSO_4$, diluted, freed from the sodium camphate with alcohol, evaporating and adding H_2SO_4 which precipitates the camphic acid, which is insoluble in water but soluble in alcohol. Its salts are called camphates.

cam-phi-ene, s. [Camphene.]

cam-phi-fer-ous, a. [From Eng. camphor, from Lat camphora; and Gr. φερω (phero) = to produce.]

Chem.: The same as Camphene (q.v.).

cam-phil, s. [From Low Lat. camphora = camphor, and oleum = oil.]

Chem.: $C_{10}H_{17}(OH)$. A monatomic alcohol there are several modifications, distinguished by their action on polarised light, as, Borneo camphor or Borneol, obtained from dryobalanops camphora, dextro 37·6°. Another dextro, 44·99, is formed together with camphic acid by the action of alcohol potash on common camphor. A third dextro, 4·5°, by distilling amber with potash. A fourth, called laevocamphol levo, 33·40, is found in the alcohol obtained by the fermentation of malt-derived sugar. Dextro-rotary camphol forms small transparent colourless hexagonal prisms which melt at 198° and distil at 212°, soluble in alcohol and ether, insoluble in water. Levo-rotary camphol forms a crystalline white powder slightly soluble in water. Camphol distilled with P_2S_5 gives a hydro carbon, $C_{10}H_{16}$. Boiled with nitric acid it is reduced to common camphor, giving off two atoms of H.

cam-phol-ate, s. [From Eng., &c. camphol, and suffix -ate (Chem.) (q.v.).]

Chem.: Camphor fused with potash unites directly with it and forms potassium camphorate, $C_{10}H_{15}KO_2$.

cam-phor, cam-phire, s. & a. [In Sw. & Dut. kamfer, Dan. kampfer, Ger. kampher; Ger. campher, Sp. canfor, Port. alcanfor, Port. chanfor, camphora, Ital. & Low Lat. canfora, O. Ital. cafora; Gr. (from Arab.) καφουρα (kaphoura). Cf. καφουρ (carpur) = an Indian tree; Arab. Pers. کافور (kâfûr), Hindust. kâpoor, Sans. karpûra.]

A. As noun:

I. Ordinary language: The substance described under II.

> "Let the country . . . breeding wood abounding with all commodities . . . as the best timber, gold, wood of cedar, sassafras, . . . camphire, and many other things."—Hakluyt: Voyages, ii. 4.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: See 2 (Chem.).

* Borneo camphor, camphor: A kind of camphor made from Dryobalanops aromatica, or Dryobalanops camphora, a genus of the order Dipterocarpeæ or Dipterads. It differs from ordinary camphor in having six-sided crystals. It is valuable, but rarely obtained here.

2. Chem.: $C_{10}H_{16}O$. It is called also Laurel Camphor. Camphor is obtained by distilling with water the leaves and wood of the camphor tree, Camphora officinarum, formerly called Laurus camphora. It is a solid white volatile crystalline mass, tough and difficult to powder, has a peculiar odour; thrown on water it revolves and is slightly soluble. It is very soluble in alcohol, ether and strong acetic acid. It has a dextro-rotary action on polarised light. Various essential oils deposit camphor when varied. [Laurineæ.]

3. Com.: Most of the camphor imported into this country comes from Formosa and Singapore. It is used to preserve natural history collections and clothes in drawers from the ravages of insects.

4. Pharm.: A powerful diffusible stimulant and antispasmodic, very useful, combined with extract of henbane, in genito-urinary irritation. It enters into mixture with opium, as a sedative, under the name of compound tincture of camphor or paregoric. It is useful in adynamic fevers, and has been employed in the treatment of hysteria, epilepsy chorea, and whooping-cough and externally, as a stimulant and relief and painful parts, as a liniment. Official preparations: Aqua camphoræ, Linimentum Camphoræ, Linimentum C. comp., spiritus camphoræ, and tinctura camphoræ-composita. Camphor is a poison to the lowest forms of animals and plants. It is antiseptic. In large doses it first vexes the pulse and renders it slow, and produces headache sickness, cold-ness of extremities, feeble circulation, unconsciousness, and even death. Undiluted it is a powerful irritant to mucous membrane and raw surfaces. "An artificial camphor can be made by passing hydrochloric acid gas through volatile oil of turpentine." (Garrod.) The virtue imputed to it of preventing infectious diseases is not founded on correct observation.

B. As adjective: Like the compound.

camphor-gland, s.

Bot.: The gland in the camphor tree which secretes the substance after which it is named.

camphor-oil, s. An aromatic oil obtained from the Dryobalanops mentioned above. It has been used for scenting soap.

camphor tree, s. A tree belonging to the order Lauraceæ, which furnishes camphor. It is the Camphora officinarum. It has pointed leaves, nine nerved, . . . It grows in Formosa, . . . of the tree are boiled, . . . being deposited after . . . mated in order to remove . . . There are two sorts of the . . . native of the isle of Borneo, from . . . best camphor is taken, which is supposed be a natural exudation from the trunk dried in such places where the bark of the tree has been wounded or cut. The other sort is a native of Japan, which Dr. Kempfer describes to be a kind of hay bearing black or purple berries, from whence the inhabitants prepare their camphor, by making a decoction of the root and wood of the tree cut into small pieces; but this sort of camphor is, in value, eighty or a hundred times less than the true Bornean camphor. (Miller.) cam-phor, cam-phire, v.t. [Camphor, s.] To impregnate or combine with camphor; to wash with camphor.

> "Her eyes . . . red and sore with crying dame . . . Camphire hot tears to cool."
> Taverner: The Garden of Prosperity.

> "Wash balls perfumed, camphired and plain, shall restore complexions."—Potter: No. 161.

cam-phor-a, s. [Camphor.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, order Lauraceæ (Camphora officinarum is the Camphor tree or Camphor Laurel). [Camphor tree.]

cam-phor-a-ceous, a. [Eng. camphor, and suff. -aceous.] Of the nature of or containing camphor.

cam-phor-ate, v.t. [Camphorate, a.] To impregnate, combine, or wash with camphor.

 cam-phor-ate, a. & s. [Eng. camphor, and suff. -ate (q.v.). In Sp. alcanfarado.]

A. As adjective: Impregnated or saturated with camphor, camphorated.

> "By shaking the saline and camphorate liquors together we easily confounded them into one high coloured liquor."—Boyle.

B. As substantive: [Camphoric Acid.]

cam-phor-a-ted, * cam-phir-a-ted, a. [Camphorate, v.t.] Impregnated or combined with camphor.

cam-phor-ic, a. [From Eng., &c. camphor; and suff. -ic.] Pertaining to camphor; occurring in or derived from camphor.

camphoric acid, s.

Chem.: $C_8H_{14}(CO_2H)_2$. Formed by the action of hot nitric acid on camphor. Camphoric acid is slightly soluble in cold water. It crystallises in small rectangular needles. By distillation it yields a colourless crystalline substance, camphoric anhydride or oxide, $C_8H_{14}(CO)_2O$. Calcium camphorate by dry distillation, yields a ketone volatile oil called Pinarone, $C_8H_{14}O$.

cam-phor-o-sma, s. [From Mod. Lat. camphora and Gr. οσμη (osme) = smell.]

Bot.: A genus of Chenopodiaceæ, the plants of which have a smell like that of camphor. All are found in Asia, except one on the Mediterranean.

cam-phyl, s. [Eng. camphor, and suffix -yl: from Gr. ὑλη (hulē) = matter, as a principle of being.]

Chem.: A monad radical $C_{10}H_{17}$. [Bornene.]

camphyl chloride, s.

Chem.: $C_{10}H_{17}HCl$. A crystalline laevo-rotary substance, isomeric with the hydrochloride of turpentine oil. It is prepared by heating camphol in a sealed tube with HCl.

(2) A cock-battle for various species of Lychnis. Prior thinks the name was given because the plant was used in chaplets with which the champions at the public games were crowned.

(3) A name for various species of Silene.

(4) A name for the Cucubalus baccifer, a silenaceous plant.

¶ Lychnis chalcedonica is the Campion of Constantinople. L. Githago is the Corn Campion. L. flos-cuculi, the Meadow Campion. Silene otites, the Moss Campion; Lychnis dioica, the Red Campion, L. coronaria, the Rose Campion, and L. vespertina, the White Campion.

cam-po-dé-a, s. [From Gr. κάμπη (kampe) = a caterpillar, and εἶδος (eidos) = form from their elongated shape.]

Entom.: A genus of Thysanura. The insects, like their allies the Lepisme, live under stones and in other dark places. Sir John Lubbock thinks it a modern representative of an ancient type form from which the higher insects originally took their rise. (Nicholson: Zoology.) camp ru-lý, a. [Camp (2), v.] Contentious, quarrelsome. (Scotch.) cámp tó-pe-tal-ous, a. [Gr. καμπτος (kamptos) = bent, curved; πετος (petos) = a tail.]

Zool.: A genus of Entomostraca, of the order Cladocera, and family Lynceidæ. There is only one species, Camptocercus macrurus. Carapace striated longitudinally, slightly sinuated and ciliated on the anterior margin; beak rather blunt. It is aquatic. (Grif & Henfrey.) camp tót ró pal, a. [Gr. καμπτος (kamptos) = curved, bent, and τροπη (tropē) = a turning, a turn.]

Bot.: For definition and example see Campylotropous.

cămp-tŭ-lĭ-cŏn, s. [Formed from Gr. καμπτός (kamptós) = flexible, from Gr. κάμπτω (kamptō) = to bend, curve; and οὖλος (oulos) = woolly, curled.] It is merely a trade name.

Fabrics: A compound used as a substitute for carpet or oil-cloth. It is made by a combination of powdered cork and the power qualities of india-rubber, and is painted or ornamented on the surface like oil-cloth. It is not suitable for chambers, as being a good conductor of heat, and feeling as cold to the bare feet as wood or oil-cloth. It may be employed for cleaning knives, which is done by covering a strip of wood with it; then sprinkling the surface with the cleaning powder, and rubbing on the knife. The surface does not wear away, and the result is very satisfactory.

cămp-ŭ-lĭt'-rō-pous, cămp-pȳ-lĭt'-rō-pal, cămp-pȳ lōt'-rō-pous, a. [Gr. καμπύλος (kampulos) = curved, and τρόπος (tropós) = a turning.]

Bot.: Having the ovule so bent or curved that the micropyle, chalasa, and hilum are near each other.

"Such ovules are called campylotropal or campylotropous, when the portions either side of the line of curvature are unequal, or camptotropal when they are equal" —Balfour: Class. p. 236.

cămp'-ȳ, a. [Camp (2), v.] (Scotch.)

1. Brave, heroical.

2. Ill-natured, quarrelsome.

cămp'-ȳl-ite, s. [Gr. καμπύλος (kampulos) = bent, crooked, curved, and Eng. suff. -ite (Min.) (q.v.).]

Min.: A variety of Mimetite or Mimetesite. Dana places it under his third variety, i.e., that containing much phosphoric acid. It is found at Dry gill, in Cumberland.

cămp-ȳl-ō-dĭs-cŭs, s. [Gr καμπύλος (kampulos) = curved, bent; δίσκος (diskos) = a disk.]

Bot.: A genus of Diatomaceæ, with frustules single, free, disk-shaped; the disk curved or twisted (saddle-shaped); furnished with mostly radiate markings, frequently interrupted. They are aquatic and marine. Smith describes nine species. (Grif & Henfrey.)

cămp-ȳl-ŏp'-tĕr-ŭs, s. [Gr. καμπύλος (kampulos) = curved, πτερόν (pteron) = a wing.]

Zool.: A genus of birds, of the family Trochilidæ, or trumming-birds.

cămp-ȳl-ō-spĕr'-măte, ° cămp-pȳl-ō-spĕr'-mous, a. [Gr καμπύλος (kampulos) = curved, σπέρμα (sperma) = a seed.]

Bot.: Having the edges of the seed curved, so as to form a channel or groove, as in some umbelliferous plants cămp-ȳ-lŏt'-rō-pal, a. [From Gr καμπύλος (kampulos) = bent, crooked, and τροπος (tropos) = a turning, and Eng. suff. -al.] The same as Campylotropous (q.v.).

cămp-ȳ lŏt'-rō-pous, a. [From Gr. καμπύλος (kampulos) = bent, crooked, and τροπος (tropos) = a turn, a direction.] [Campulitropous.]

Bot.: A term used of an axis of an ovule when, in place of being straight, it is curved down upon itself to such an extent that the formen almost touches the hilum. Example, the Mignonette. (Lindley.)

cămp-ȳ-lŏs, s. [Gr. καμπύλος (kampulos) = crooked, bent.]

Entomol.: A genus of coleopterous insects of the tribe Elaterides. Campylus linearis is common in Britain.

° camp-yon, s. [Campion, Champion.]

cām'-ocho, cā'm-ochel, a. [Etym. doubtful. Cf. camshachle.]

1. Crooked.

"The hornyt cyvil quhilk we clepe the nicht oule,
Within hir cauerne hard I schoute and youle
Laithely of leyne, with cruikit camocho beik, Ugsum to here was hir wyld eldritche shreik."
Douglas: Virgil xii. 2.

2. Ill-humoured, contentious, crabbed; denoting crookedness or perverseness of temper cām-shach-le, cām-shāuch-le (ch guttural), v.t. [From Scotch cam = crooked, and shauchle (q.v.).] To distort ¶ Shauchle is to distort in one direction, camshachle in two.

cām-strŭ'-ŏus, a. [Probably from the same as Camstearie.] Perverse, unmanageable. (Scotch.)

° cā'-mūs, s. [Camis.]

"And was yclad, for heat or scorching air,
All in silken camus, lilly white,
Purfled upon with many a folded plight."
Spenser: F. Q., II. iii. 28.

cā'-mūs, cā'-mūse, s. [Camous.]

° cā'-mūsed, a. [Camoused.]

"She was camused."—Gower: C. A., ii. 236.

cām'-wood, s. [From the native word kambi.]

A wood produced by a leguminous plant, Baphia nitida. It is a dye-wood, used with alum and tartar as a mordant; but the colour is not permanent. It is employed for dyeing bandana handkerchiefs, the hue being deepened by the addition of sulphate of iron. Turners use it for making knife-handles, and cabinet-makers for ornamental knobs to furniture. Camwood is called also Barwood and Ringwood.

"A red dye-wood first brought from Africa by the Portuguese. It is principally obtained from the vicinity of Sierra Leone, where it is called Kambi; whence its name of cam or camwood has obviously been derived. The colouring matter which it affords differs but little from that of ordinary Nicaragua wood."—McCulloch: Dictionary of Commerce.

2. Hist.: The Egyptians very early made a canal connecting the Nile and the Red Sea. It was reopened by Pharaoh Necho about 605 B.C., and at intervals by others after him. Most of the ancient nations had canals. The great canal of China was constructed partly in the seventh and partly in the ninth century, A.D.; it is 825 miles long. The first known English canal was cut by the Romans at Caerdike. The Trent and the Witham were joined in 1134, and the Bridgwater canal was commenced in 17.. The Caledonian canal was projected in 1803, but not opened till 1822. The Erie canal was begun in 1817 and completed in 1825. The Suez canal, connecting the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, was opened on the 17th November, 1869. The attempted canal across the Isthmus of Darien proved a failure. One is projected, from the Atlantic to the Pacific through Nicaragua. It is proposed that this canal shall be controlled and operated by our own people, to whom it will give convenient and speedy communication between Atlantic and Pacific ports; providing also great strategic advantage in case of war with a foreign power. The great Kiel canal, constructed by the German government for strategic purposes, connects the waters of the Baltic and North Seas. It was formally opened on June 20, 1895.

Thomson.

¶ Tropic of Cancer: [TROPIC.]

4. Med.: A malignant growth which is found in different parts of the human body, having a tendency to spread more or less rapidly, and ultimately to terminate in death. Cancer is an inherited disease, and its growth is in all probability due to some peculiar morbid material separated from the blood, and which is constantly being renewed. Two kinds of cancer are usually described, viz., scirrhus or hard cancer, and medullary or soft cancer. But there are several varieties of the latter. Hard cancer occurs most frequently in the female breast, axilla, parotid gland in the neck, and in the rectum. Soft cancer affects for the most part the internal organs, as the liver, spleen, kidneys, stomach, &c.; but there is scarcely any organ or tissue of the body which may not become the seat of this form of the disease. Hard cancer rarely occurs until after forty years of age, and is usually slow in its progress. Soft cancer, on the other hand, is most common in early life, and generally runs a very rapid course. Cancers may, under certain circumstances, be removed by surgical operation, but they are almost certain to return.

cannon-casting, s. & a.

A. As adj.: Casting or designed to cast cannon.

B. As subst.: The art or operation of casting a cannon. The moulds for brass cannon are formed by wrapping a long taper rod of wood with a peculiar soft rope, over which is applied a coating of loam, which, as the work proceeds, is dried over a long fire, a templet being applied to form the proper outline. This model is made about one-third longer than the gun is to be. It is next, when dry, blacklead-washed, and covered with a shell of loam not less than three inches thick, secured by iron bands, which is also carefully dried. The model is next removed by withdrawing the taper rod and the rope, and extracting the pieces of loam. The parts for the cascabel and trunnions are formed upon wooden models, and then attached to the exterior of the shell; handles, dolphins, or ornamental figures, are modelled in wax, and placed on the clay model previous to moulding the shell, from which they are melted out before casting. The melted metal is then admitted to the bottom of the mould through two gates, one on each side, or in some similar way. Cannons are made solid, and are then bored by being made to revolve around a drill. (Knight, &c.)

(ii) The list or catalogue of saints.

(2) Of the Mass:

That part of the Mass which begins after the Sanctus with the prayer Te igitur, and ends, according to some, just before the Pater noster, according to others, just before the distribution of the elements. The name canon is given to this part of the Mass because it contains the fixed rule according to which the sacrifice of the New Testament is to be offered. (Gloss. and Arnold.)

2. Of persons:

(1) In the same sense as (2).

(2) In the Church of Rome: (b) A member of an order of religious persons intermediate between the regular monks and the secular clergy. The canons lived together, ate at the same table, joined in united prayer at stated hours, but did not take vows like those of the regulars, besides which they officiated in certain churches. Chrodegang, Bishop of Metz, about the middle of the eighth century, is said to have instituted the order. At first the members were called Fratres [or of the Lord's brethren], but afterwards Canonici. Lewis the Meek caused rules to be drawn up for their guidance by the Council of Aix-la-Chapelle, A.D. 817, and instituted an examination of witnesses. Having become corrupt, rules for their reformation were made by Nicolas II. in the Council at Rome, A.D. 1059. Also, at the same time, some canons influenced by Ivo, afterwards Bishop of Chartres, renounced private property, and became virtual monks. Hence arose the distinction between secular and regular canons, the former obeying the rule of Nicolas II. and the latter following that of Ivo. Ivo's rule being almost the same that St. Augustine had before introduced in his see, the regular canons were often called Canons under the rule of St. Augustine, or simply Canons of St. Augustine. In the twelfth century mutual jealousy created a long and bitter controversy between the monks and the canons. An effort was made in the 17th century to restore the monastic and semi-monastic orders to their pristine purity, and the Reformed Canons regular of St. Augustine arose. Three other regular orders were established in 1666 by Pope Clement IX. (Mosheim.)

(3) In the Church of England: A certain dignitary in cathedral churches; a residentiary member of a cathedral chapter.

"Swift much admires the place and air,
And hears he is a canon there
A canon! that's a place for noses:
No, doctor, you shall be a dean
Two dozen canons round your stall,
And you the tyrant over them all."—Swift.

¶ The name Canon Street in London, having reference to the cathedral chapter of St. Paul's, is an indication of the identity of the two words canon and canon.

(ii) Biblical Criticism & Church History: Those books of Scripture which are received as inspired and canonical, as distinguished from the apocrypha. [II. 1.]

"Canon also denotes those books of scripture, which are received as inspired and canonical, to distinguish them from other profane, apocryphal, or disputed books. Thus we say, that Genesis is part of the sacred canon of the scripture."—Ayliffe Parergon Juris Canonici.

¶ It is also applied to any one of the canonical epistles (q.v.).

1. Old Testament Canon: The ancient canon of the Old Testament is ordinarily attributed, on the authority of Jewish Talmudic tradition, to Ezra (Esdras of the Apocrypha), and the most modern research admits that he at least took the first step in the work by lending strong public sanction to the Pentateuch, and giving it increased currency (Ezra vii. 6, 10, 11; Neh. viii. 1, 8, 13-18; 1 Esdr. viii. 3, 7, 9, 19, 23; ix. 39, 40, 42, 45, 48; 2 Esdr. xiv. 21, 22, 25, 26).

A great addition to this first canon seems to have been made by Nehemiah, of whom it is said in 2 Macc. ii. 14, "The same things also were reported in the writings and commentaries of Neemias, and how he, founding a library, gathered together the acts of the kings and the prophets, and of David, and the epistles of the kings concerning the holy gifts." By these designations probably were meant the books from Joshua to 2 Kings inclusive, the four greater and most of the minor prophets, with some of the Psalms.

A third canon seems hinted at in 2 Macc. ii. 14. "In like manner also Judas gathered together all those things that were lost by reason of the war we had, and they remain with us." By Judas is meant Judas Maccabæus. His canon seems to have added Proverbs, the Song of Solomon, Daniel, some of the Psalms, &c., or, speaking broadly, the books called Kethubim in Hebrew, or in Greek Hagiographa. Doubts about the canonicity of parts of Ezekiel, and the whole of Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Esther, and Proverbs, were not set at rest till a decision in the favour was obtained from the Jewish Synod of Jabneh, or Jamnia, about A.D. 90. Josephus soon afterwards arbitrarily fixed the Old Testament books at twenty two, to make them agree in number with the letters of the Hebrew alphabet, and the Talmud at twenty four, because that is the number of the Greek alphabet. All the thirty-nine books in our modern Bibles found a place, separate or combined, in those enumerations. Jerome also, like Josephus, made twenty two, a number which the Council of Carthage, A.D. 397, much enlarged by taking in the Apocrypha. [APOCRYPHA.]

2. New Testament Canon: The germ of what afterwards became the New Testament canon was in existence when the Second Epistle of Peter was written (2 Pet. iii. 15, 16). About A.D. 144 the "heretic" Marcion came from Pontus to Rome, bringing with him a collection of sacred books, viz., the Gospel of St. Luke and ten Pauline epistles, those of Timothy and Titus being omitted. According to Dr. Samuel Davidson, the idea of an inspired New Testament canon and of a Catholic church came into existence together about 170 A.D. The canon which then grew up consisted of two parts, the Gospel [τὸ εὐαγγέλιον (to euangelion)] and the Apostle [ὁ ἀπόστολος (ho apostolos)], the former containing the four gospels, the latter the Acts of the Apostles, thirteen epistles of St. Paul, one of St. Peter, one of St. John, and the Revelation. The canon of Muratori, about the same date, differs in omitting 1 Peter and including 2 and 3 John, as also Jude. Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian, had all their separate canons. Origen, about A.D. 254, recognised three classes of books—those generally admitted, those not authentic, and those doubtful. Similarly Eusebius, A.D. 340, divided the sacred writings into three classes—those generally received [ὁμολογούμενα (homologoumena)], those controverted [ἀντιλεγόμενα (antilegomena)], and those heretical. The canon of the New Testament, in the form in which we now have it, except that the Apocalypse was ignored, was settled by the Council of Laodicea, A.D. 367, and confirmed by the 14th Council of Carthage, A.D. 397, one of the members present at which being the celebrated Augustine. (Dr. Samuel Davidson: Canon, &c.) [BIBLE.]

(iii) Law:

1. Eccles. Law. [CANON LAW.]

2. English Civil Law: A rule. Used specially in the expression Canons of inheritance, which are the rules regulating the descent of real property when the owner or "purchaser" dies intestate. The Act of Parliament determining such cases is 3 and 4, Wm. IV., c. 106. (Wharton.)

(iv) Music: A species of musical composition, written according to strict rule (hence the term), in which the different voices take up the same melody, one after another, either at the same or at a different pitch.

"A canon at the unison becomes a round if the antecedent has a cadence before the entry of the consequent."—Weber & Burnett.

(v) Printing: A size of type equal to 4-lines

His stubborn steed with canon bitt."
Spenser F. Q. I. vii. 37.

canon-law, The body of ecclesiastical law as laid down by the canons.

"This is mere moral babble, and direct Against the canon laws of our foundation."
Milton Comus, 806.

History of the Canon Law:

(1) Before the Reformation: A community, civil or religious, no sooner comes into existence than it requires rules for its government, and those first formed require to be modified and developed and added to during the whole period that the community exists. Hence the first germs of the canon law are to be sought for in apostolic times, whilst its complete development took place at the period when the power of the Papacy reached its height. The oldest canons are called Apostolic canons (q.v.). The canons of the Councils of Nice (A.D. 325), Constantinople (A.D. 381), Ephesus (A.D. 431), and Chalcedon (A.D. 451) obtained civil sanction by decree of Justinian. Till the twelfth century the canon law consisted mainly of these canons collected, together with the capitularies of Charlemagne and the decrees of the Popes, from Siricius, A.D. 398, to Atha-nation IV., A.D. 1184. In A.D. 1234 Ivo, Bishop of Chartres, endeavoured to enforce the decrees made by popes and the councils. Gratian, a Benedictine monk, [illegible] the collection and published it in 1140. These followed the Decretals of Gregory IX., in A.D. 1234. [DECRETAL.] Next came the "Sext" of Boniface VIII., A.D. 1300 [SEXT], the Clementines or Constitutions of Clement V., A.D. 1305 [CLEMENTINE], and the Extravagants of John XXII., A.D. 1317. [EXTRAVAGANT.] These, with some more recent "Extravagantes," constitute the "Corpus Juris Canonici" (The Body of Canon Law). These lawyers practised in canon and others in civil law, while not a few did so in both. As the fully developed canon law greatly exalted the ecclesiastical over the civil power, it was never very cordially accepted by the English Parliament, and there was a national canon law composed of legatine and provincial constitutions.

(f) Since the Reformation: By 25 Hen. VIII. c. 19, repealed by 1 Phil. and Mary, c. 8, but re-enacted by 1 Eliz., c. 1, a revision of canon law was ordered, and only those parts of it were left binding which were not repugnant to the common or statute law. In the 27th year of Henry VIII., degrees in canon law were abolished, not however by Parliament, but by mandate. In 1604, under James I., certain ordinances analogous to canons were enacted by the clergy, but never received the sanction of Parliament. It has therefore been adjudged that where they introduce anything new they are not binding on the laity.

cân-ôn-ĭs-ā'-tion, cân-ôn ĭz-ā'-tion, s. [Fr. canonisation; Ital. canonizzazione; from Low Lat. canonizo = to canonize.]

1. The act of canonizing or enrolling any person in the canon or list of saints. In the Roman Catholic Church this is preceded by beatification. The practice of giving saintly honours to deceased Christians arose among the common people. In the 9th century some restraint was put upon it by the ecclesiastical councils. The first instance of the enrolment by the Roman bishop of a deceased person among the saints was that of Udalrich, Bishop of Augsburg, by John XV., in A.D. 993. In the third Lateran Council, A.D. 1179, the right of conferring such honour was limited to the Pope.

"It is very suspicious that the interests of particular families, or churches, have too great a sway in canonizations."—Addison.

"Even at the canonization of a saint, ..."—Hall: Liberty, ch. ii.

2. The state of being canonized.

can-zo-na, can-zo-nà (z as tz), s. [Ital.]

1. A short song, in which the music is of much more importance than the words. It is one of the ancient forms of measured melody, and when the older writers employed it, it was usually made the vehicle for the display of skill and contrivance in the treatment of the phrases in fugal imitation. A secondary meaning of the word, scoffing or banter, perhaps accounts for the use of a form in which a musical imitation or mocking was shown.

2. In the early part of the last century the word was used to describe an instrumental composition, similar to the sonata as then known. (Stainer & Barrett.) can-zon-ét, s. [Ital. canzonetta, dim. of canzone, canzona (q.v.).]

Music: A short song, one brief compared with the sacred airs of the oratorio, or with the aria of the Italian opera.

Chem.: $C_{10}H_{16}$. An aromatic hydrocarbon, boiling at 171°, obtained by the destructive distillation of india-rubber.

caout-chouc, s. [American-Indian word.]

1. Bot.: India-rubber, so called because its primary use was, and is, the removal of pencil marks from paper. It is an elastic, gummy substance, consisting of the inspissated juice of various more or less milky species of plants. The greater part of the caoutchouc of commerce is the product of four euphorbiaceous trees, Siphonia elastica, from French Guiana, S. brasiliensis, lutea, and brevifolia from Brazil; the caoutchouc of the last three species comes to this country through the port of Para. It is furnished also by Ficus elastica, sometimes called by way of pre-eminence the India-rubber tree. It is derived also from some artocarpads, specially Castilloa elastica, and some Apocynaceæ, notably Urceola elastica. It exists to a certain extent in most milky plants.

2. Comm., manuf., &c.: Caoutchouc was first brought to Europe early in the eighteenth century. Dr. Priestly pointed out that it might be used to rub out pencil marks, crumb of bread having been previously employed for the purpose. In 1791 Samuel Pliat obtained a patent for making waterproof fabrics by caoutchouc dissolved in spirits of turpentine. Hancock, in 1823, and Macintosh followed in the same direction. Mr. Chas. Goodyear invented the vulcanising process, which by compounding with it a small amount of sulphur renders it as hard as horn, and well adapted for various purposes to the arts.

¶ Mineral Caoutchouc:

Min.: A name for Elaterite (q.v.).

caout-chou-çin (c silent), s. [From Eng., &c. caoutchouc, and suff. -in (Chem.).]

2. Anat.: Very fine, or minute as hair: applied to the minute vessels by which the arteries and veins communicate with each other.

"Ten capillary arteries in some parts of the body, as in the brain, are to 1 equal to one hair: and the small and lymphatick vessels are an hundred times smaller than the smallest capillary artery."—Arbuthnot: On Aliments, p. 125.

3. Surg.: Applied to a linear fracture of the skull, unattended with any separation of the parts of the injured bones.

B. As substantive:

1. Anat.: One of the very fine minute vessels or tubes connecting the arteries and [illegible] entering the minutest capillaries and establishing communications." — Bishop Berkeley: Thoughts on Tar-Water.

2. Bot.: The Maidenhair Fern, Adiantum capillus-veneris.

"The hyssop may tolerably be taken for some kind of mosse: capillary, which best maketh out the authentic with the colour."—Sir T. Browne: On the Plants in Scripture, p. 6 capillary attraction, s.

Nat. Phil.: The molecular attraction or repulsion, specially the former, which takes place when one end of a tube of slender bore is immersed in a fluid. In the case supposed the fluid ascends it to a considerable height. Capillary attraction aids the passage upwards of sap in the vessels of plants. It may be gravity acting at minute distances.

capillary filter, s. A simple mode of freeing water of its larger impurities by means of a cord of loose fibre, such as cotton candle-wick. (Knight.) capillary-multifid, a.

Bot.: The same as CAPILLACEOUSLY-MULTIFID (q.v.).

capillary-pyrites, s.

Min.: The same as Millerite (q.v.).

capillary-repulsion, s.

Nat. Phil.: The cause which determines the descent of a fluid in a capillary tube below the level of the surrounding fluid, when the tube is dipped in that fluid. It is the opposite to capillary attraction.

capillary system, s.

Anat.: The system or series of minute tubes described under capillary vessels (q.v.).

capillary vessels, s. pl.

Anat.: Vessels of hair-like minuteness, into which both the arteries and the veins divide, thus giving rise to the distinction of arterial and venous capillaries. The arteries which afford a channel to the blood immediately on its departure from the heart are large in breadth and capacity, but they divide again and again, as a tree does its branches, till they terminate in minute tubes of $\frac{1}{1000}$th to $\frac{1}{2000}$th of an inch in diameter. Pointing most closely to the mouth of these are the venous capillaries, which unite into larger and larger veins, as streamlets do to constitute a river. The action of the capillaries can be well seen under a powerful microscope in the partly transparent foot of a frog.

 cāp-il-lā-tion, s. [Lat. capillatio; from capillus = hair.] A hair-like filament or tube; a capillary-vessel.

"Nor is the humour contained in smaller veins or obscurer capillations, but in a vesicle."—Sir T. Browne: Vulgar Errours.

 cə-pil'-lə-tūre, s. [Lat. capillatura; from capillus = hair.] The act of dressing the hair.

† cə-pil'-li-form, a. [Lat. capillus = hair, forma = form, shape.] Having the form or shape of a hair.

cāp-il-lit-i-fūm, s. [Lat. capillus = hair.]

Bot.: Entangled filamentary matter in fungals bearing sporidia. (Treas. of Bot.)

† cāp-il'-lōse, a. & s. [Lat. capillosus = hairy; capillus = hair.]

A. As adj.: Hairy, covered with hair.

B. As subst.:

Min.: The same as Millerite (q.v.).

cap-i-mute, s. [CAPLEMUTE.]

cap-pis'-trum, s. [Lat. = a cellar, a head.]

Surg.: A bandage, used chiefly in cases of injury or fractures of the lower jaw.

cap'-i-tal, a. [Fr. capital; Ital. capitale; Lat. capitalis = pertaining to the head; caput (gen. capitis) = a head.]

1. Of or pertaining to the head or chief town of a country or kingdom; metropolitan, chief.

"This had been
Perhaps thy capital seat, from whence had spread All generations . . ."—Milton: P. L., xi. 362.

2. Applied to circumstances of any kind involving or affecting life.

"In capital causes, wherein but one man's life is in question, the evidence ought to be clear . . . much more in a judgment upon a war which is capitall to thousands."—Bacon.

* 3. Important in the highest degree; chief, principal, essential.

"For undoubtedly, both repletion and superfluous sleep is capitall enemies to studye as they be unto bodye & health of body and soule."—Sir T. Elyot: Governour, bk. i., ch. 11.

4. Excellent; good or fine in the highest degree.

"Those who were on the ground had the pleasure of witnessing some capital play, . . ."—Daily Telegraph, Feb. 17, 1881.

B. Technically:

1. Comm. (Capital stock): The sum of money raised by the joint contributions of the partners in a company, to be employed in the business of that company.

2. Fortif. (Capital line): An imaginary line dividing any work into similar and equal parts.

3. Law:

(1) Offences: Criminal in the highest degree. Affecting the head, i.e., the life of any person. Involving in old times the loss of one's head, though now in England the punishment of death is inflicted in a different manner.

"Edmund, I arrest thee
On capital treason . . ."—Shakesp.: King Lear, v. 3.

(2) Of the punishment, involving the loss of one's head or life.

"Due by the law to capital punishment."—Milton: Hist. Eng., i. 128.

"The abolition of capital punishment would not make more murders."—Times, May 3, 1864. Mr Bright's Speech.

4. Printing (Capital letters). [CAPITAL, s., A. I. 9.]

capital offence, s. Crime involving capital punishment.

capital punishment, s. The penalty of death.

cap'-i-tal, * cap-i-tale, * cap-i-tel, s. [O. Fr. chapitel, capitel; Sp. & Port. capitel; Lat. capitellum = a little head; dimin. of caput = a head.]

A. Ordinary Language:

I. Literally:

1. In the same sense as B. 1 (q.v.).

2. The head or chief city of any country or kingdom; the metropolis. [II. 2.]

"Pandæm . . . nam, the high capital
Of Satan . . ."—Milton: P. L., i. 756.

3. A letter of a larger size than, and of a different form from, those ordinarily used; a capital letter. [B. 6.]

* 4. A heading or chapter . . . a book; a section. [CAPITLE.]

"Holy St. Bernard hath said in his 86th capitall . . ."—Scott: Discoverie.

II. Figuratively:

1. Applied to the political views or opinions, which form, as it were, the capital on which a politician trades.

2. The inhabitants of the chief city of any country.

"The general opinion, at least of the capital, seems to have been that Bernard was cruelly treated."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

B. Technically:

1. Arch.: The head or upper portion of a column.

CAPITALS.

2. Fortif.: An imaginary line bisecting the salient angle, formed by the intersection of two projecting lines of parapet, of a fortification.

3. Polit. Econ.: The surplus of individual or national wealth which remains after current necessities have been met. It consists of what are popularly called savings. It is available for the employment of new labour, and if this be done judiciously, it will produce a further surplus, or, in other words, the capital will increase. In every well ordered community it tends to do so indefinitely. Capital and labour mutually require each other, and are not natural foes but natural friends.

¶ Certain economists regard capital as "the sum of all wealth resulting from labor, less the actual cost of the laborers' subsistence"; and thence argue that justice would indicate an equitable distribution of such surplus amongst the actual producers thereof, rather than its absorption by the employing class designated as "capitalists."

4. Commerce, &c:

(1) The stock or fund employed in any trade or manufacture.

"This accumulated stock, of the product of former labour is termed capital."—J. S. Mill: Principles of Political Economy, bk. i., ch. iv., § 1.

(2) The fund of a trading company or corporation. It is generally called capital stock.

5. Distilling: The head of a still.

6. Printing: A large or upper-case letter.

† cap'-i-tal-e l, a. [CAPITAL, s.] Having a capital or capitals.

cap'-i-tal-ism, s. [Eng. capital, s.; -ism.] The possession of capital; the system under which capitalists flourish.

cā-pōn-et, s. [Eng. capon, and dim. suffix -et.] A young capon.

cą-pon-i-ére, cą-pon-ni-ére, s. [Fr. caponnière; Sp. capo nera; It. coppaniera. Perhaps allied to Fr. capon-ner = to disimmulate in order to succeed. (Mahn.)]

Fortif.: A covered lodgment, of about four or five feet broad, encompassed with a little parapet of about two feet high, serving to support planks laden with earth. This lodgment contains fifteen or twenty soldiers, and is usually placed at the extremity of the counterscarp, having little embrasures made in them, through which they fire. (Harris.)

¶ Certain differences in construction give rise to the following names: Covered, or casemated capuniere; open capuniere; single, simple, or half capuniere; pritmale capuniere. (Knight.)

cā-pōn-ize, v.t. [Eng. capon, and suffix -ize (q.v.).] To castrate, as a capon.

"... an operator who caponized a young blackbird of about six weeks old. —Barrington: On the Singing of Birds.

cap-or-qi-an-ite, s. [From Monte Caporciano, in Tuscany, where it is found; suff. -ite.]

Min.: A variety of Laumontite (q.v.). It occurs in pearly monoclinic crystals of a flesh-red colour; sp. gr., 2·67; hardness, 2·5—3·5; comp. silica, 53·0; alumina, 22·7; lime, 13·4; water, 11·9.

cą-pōt, s. [Fr. capot, être capot = to be baffled; faire capot = to capot; Ger. capot = ruined, broken; probably abbreviated from Lat. caput-mortuum = a dead person or body.] When one player wins all the tricks of cards at the game of piquet he has effected a capot.

cą-pōt, v.t. [Capot, s.] To effect a capot on one's antagonist in piquet.

"That one game I had with my sweet cousin. I capotted her. —Lamb: Essays of Elia, Imp. Dictionary: Open, Old Whist.

"He (the youth, Dorothea) wore a little broun capouch, girt very neat to his body with a white lace. —Shelton: Don Quixote, bk. iv., ch. 1.

cāp-pā-dine, s. [Etymology doubtful.] A sort of silk flock or waste of tained from the cocoon after the silk has been reeled off, and used for shag in making rugs. (Simmonds.)

Cāp-pą-dō-çi-ą, *cap-er-doch-y (ch as k), corruption of cappadocia. (Nares.)] An old slang term for a prison.

"... a spell to the jolle." My old aunt's son, my dear knee-cousin Appadocia. —Parsdan. (Nares.)

Cap pagh, s. & a. [From Cappagh, near Cork, in Ireland.]

cappagh brown, s. Manganese brown. There are two shades of it, light and dark cappagh browns. (Ogilvie.) cāp pan ūs, s. [Etymology unknown.] A kind of worm, very hurtful to ships' bottoms, to which it adheres.

cāp pār-ā-m, s. pl. [Lat. capparis, fem. pl. suff. -ea.]

Bot.: A sub-order of the Capparidaceæ, comprising those species in which the fruit is a berry.

cāp-pār-id, s. [Lat. capparis (genit. capparidis).]

Bot.: The English form of the name of the Capparidaceæ.

... are chiefly tropical plants. —Balfour: Botany, p. ... cāp pār-i-dā-çē-ą, s. pl. [Lat. capparis (genit. capparidis), and fem. pl. suffix -aceæ.]

Bot.: A natural order of thalamifloral dicotyledons, placed by Lindley in his Ustal alliance. They are herbs, shrubs, or trees with alternate leaves and solitary or clustered flowers. The ovary is generally stalked, with parietal placentas and reniform seeds. They are akin to Cruciferæ. The order is divided into two sub-orders—1. Cleomeæ, with dry, dehiscent fruit. Capparæ, the fruit of which is a berry. The plants are principally tropical, and have pungent and stimulant qualities. The flower buds of C. spinosa constitute capers. [Caper (4), s.] There are thirty-three known genera and 350 species.

cāp-pār-is, s. [Latin, from Gr. κάππαρις (kapparis).] [Caper (4), s.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, the typical one of the order Capparidaceæ. It consists of shrubs having simple leaves, frequently with two little spines at their base, and showy flowers with a four-parted calyx, four petals, and numerous stamens. The most generally known species is the Capparis spinosa, the Common Caper (q.v.), which grows on walls, &c., in the south of Europe and Mediterranean regions. Its mode of growth resembles a bramble. It is a stimulant, antiscorbutic and aperient. So also are C. cynophallophora, C. amphibalina, and Breynia blisters like cantharides. (Lindley, &c.) C. Sodada is one of the characteristic features of the vegetation of Africa, from the Desert to the Nile. The small berries, which have a pungent taste, form an important article of food, and the roots, when burnt, supply salt. It has a narcotic odour, and its acrid stimulating fruits are employed by women to produce fecundity.

cappe, s. [Cap.]

"A vernicle hadde he ... wed on his cappe
His walet lay byfore him in his lappe.
Chaucer: The Prologue, l. 687-8.

capped quarts, s.

Min.: A variety of Quartz. (Brit. Mus. Catal.)

capped rail, s.

Railroad Engineering: A railroad rail which has a steel cap attached to an iron body. It is generally made by so disposing the steel in a fagot as to form the edge of that metal, in rolling. It is otherwise known as a steel-capped or steel-headed rail. (Knight.) [Rail.]

cą, pōl, s. [From cap (?).] The iron at the ends and middle of the axle-tree, whipple-tree, or cross-bar, used for dongling or harrowing, to which the traces of the traces are placed. (Halliwell.)

cāp-pēl-ing, s. [Caplevne.] A small iron skull-cap worn by archers in the middle ages. (Ogilvie.)

cāp-pēr (1), s. [Cap (2), s.] Apparently cup-bearer; a person in the list of the king's household servants. (Fitzstephen, ed. 1758, p. 204; in ed. 1814, Capperis.) [Copper.]

cāp-pēr (2). cap-par, s. [Eng. cap, and suffix -er.] One who makes or sells caps.

"Cappar, bonnettier.—Palsgrave.

cāp pēr (3), s. [Apparently from cap, the last portion of A.S. attorcappe = a spider.] A spider. (Scotch.) cāp pēr nōlt-y, cāp pēr-nōlt-ed, a. [Caupernoitie.]

cāp-pie, s. [From Eng. & Scotch cap, and dimin. suff. -ie.]

1. A little cap.

2. A kind of beer between table-beer and ale, formerly drunk by the middle classes, which seems to have been thus denominated, because it was customary to hand it round in a little cup or quaich. It is called also cap-ale. (Nichols.)

cāp pī-ōw, v.t. [A softened form of Dan. kapsiber = to run with emulation, to contest, (Jamieson.)] To distance another in a contest. cā-pr-, [Lat. caprea = a she-goat; caper (genit. capri) = a he-goat.]

Zool.: A genus of ruminant mammals containing the true goats. There are horns in both sexes, and lachrymal sinuses are absent. There is a beard or long hair on the throat in both sexes, or in some species in the male only. Capra hircus is the domestic goat. It is thought to be a descendant of C. aegagrus of Persia and the Caucasus. C. Ibex is the Ibex of the Alps, and C. pyrenaica that of the Pyrenees. (Goat.)

Paleont.: Capra has not been found earlier than the Post-Pliocene beds.

cāp-rāte, s. [From Eng. caprylic; and suff. -ate.] [Caprylic Acid.]

cāp-rēl, s. [A dimin. of caper (q.v.).] A caper.

"Sik a mirthless musick their minstrels did make.
While ky cast caprels behind with their heels."
Edward Fighting Watson's Coll., iii. 28.

cą-prēl-i-ą, s. [Latin dimin. of caper = a goat.]

Zool.: A genus of crustaceans, the type of one of the family Caprellidæ (q.v.). ... Phronis is the best known species. Phronis is a genus of Mantidæ, to which these crustaceans present a superficial resemblance, but no real affinity.

cą-prēl-li-dæ, s. pl. [From Lat. caprella, and fem. pl. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of crustaceans, order Læmodipoda.

cą-prē-ō-late, a. [In Mod. Lat. capreolatus, from Class. Lat. capreolus = a tendril.]

Bot.: Winding and clasping with tendrils, cirrous.

"... such plants as turn, wind, and creep along the ground, by means of their tendrils, as gourds, melons, and ... are termed, in botany, capreolate plants. Hieron.

cą-prē-ōl, v.i. [Caper, v.] To caper, to skip like a roe. (Sir Philip Sydney.)

cą-prē-ō-lūs, cą-prē-ō-lūs, s. [Lat. capreolus = a kind of wild goat, chamois, or ... buck.]

1. Zool.: A genus of mammals, family Cervidæ. Capreolus caprea is the Roebuck (q.v.).

2. Paleont.: There is in the Pliocene an extinct fossil species allied to the roebuck.

* 3. Bot.: A tendril.

cāp-rēt, s. [Ital. capretto; dimin. of capresco = a goat.] A young goat, a kid.

"As caprot and hert thou shalt ete." Wycliffe: Deut. ...

cāp-rīc, a. [From Lat. capra = a she-goat; caper = a he-goat.]

capric acid, s.

Chem.: $C_9H_{19}CO_2 = C_{10}H_{20}O_2 = C_9H_{19}O.CO.OH$. The same as Rutic Acid. A monatomic, fatty acid which exists as a glyceride in butter and cocoa-nut oil, in fusel oil, and is formed by the oxidation of oleic acid and of oil of rue. It is a colourless crystalline body, having a slight odour of the goat. It melts at 28°. It is insoluble in cold water, soluble in alcohol and ether. It forms crystalline salts called caprates or rutates, sparingly soluble in cold water.

ca-prĭç'-ĭ-ō (ça as tsh), s. [Ital. capriccio.] [CAPRICE.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A caprice.

2. Music: A name which has been given at different times to different kinds of musical compositions. Now it is generally applied to a piece composed on original subjects, or to a brilliant transcription of one or more subjects by other composers. (Grove.)

"Will this capriccio hold in thee, art sure?"
Shakesp.: All's Well that Ends Well, ii. 3.

ca-prĭç-ĭ-ō'-sō (ça as tsh), adv. [Ital. capriccioso = capricious, humoursome.]

Music: In a whimsical, humorous manner; after the style of a capriccio.

ca-prĭç'-ĭ-o (ch as sh), * ca-prĭç'-ĭ-o, * ca-prĭ'-ch-ĭ-o (ch as sh), * că-prĭç-ĭ-o, s. [Fr. caprice; Sp. and Port. capricho; Ital. capriccio = shaking in a fever; whim, fancy.]

1. A whim adopted by a sudden change of opinion, and probably to be cast off in a little for some new one; a freak, a fancy.

"Not that the Former of us all, in this,
Or aught He does, is governed by caprice."
Cowper: Truth, 302.

2. Capricious habit or disposition; capriciousness.

"The folly . . . and caprice of the present age."—Spectator, No. 488.

3. The same as capriccio (2) (q.v.).

¶ For the difference between caprice and humour see HUMOUR.

* cap-rich, s. [CAPRICE.]

* căp-rĭ'-çĭ-ō, * căp-rĭ'-chĭ-ō, s. [Ital. capriccio.] A freak, fancy, caprice.

"To have viewed the soul stark naked, watched her loose in her frisks, her gambols, her capricios."—Sterne: Trist. Shandy, ch. xxiii.

căp-rĭ'-cious, a. [Fr. capricieux; Ital. capriccioso, from caprice (q.v.).] Subject to, or full of caprice; whimsical, fanciful.

"The lower animals are, as we shall hereafter see, capricious in their affections, aversions, and sense of beauty."—Darwin: Desc. of Man, vol. i. (1871), pt. i., ch. ii., p. 63.

¶ For the difference between capricious and fanciful see FANCIFUL.

căp-rĭ'-cious-lў, adv. [Eng. capricious; -ly.] In a capricious manner; in caprice; whimsically, fancifully.

"But on the same continent the species often range widely and almost capriciously."—Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 1859), ch. xii., p. 394.

căp-rĭ'-cious-nĕss, s. [Eng. capricious; -ness.] The quality of being capricious, or full of caprice.

"A subject ought to suppose that there are reasons, although he be not apprised of them; otherwise, he must tax his prince of capriciousness, inconstancy, or ill design."—Swift.

Că-prĭ-corn, Căp-rĭ-cor'-nŭs, s. [Lat. capricornus; from caper = a goat, and cornu = a horn.]

Astronomy:

1. The tenth of the twelve signs of the zodiac, represented on globes in the form of a goat. It is the first of the winter and fourth of the summer signs.

2. The term is applied also to the part of the ecliptic between 270 and 300 E. long. The sun enters it about the 21st of December, at the winter solstice.

"Let the longest night in Capricorn be of fifteen hours, the day consequently must be of nine."—Notes to Creech's Manilius.

"And, what was ominous, that very morn
The sun was entered into Capricorn."
Dryden: Hind & Panther, iii. 866.

* cāp'-rĭd, a. [Lat. caper = a wild goat.] Of or pertaining to the goat tribe.

cāp'-rĭ-dæ, s. pl. [Lat. caper (genit. capri); fem. pl. suffix -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of ruminant mammals, of which the genus Capra, or goat, is the type.

† cą-prĭf'-ĭ-cāte, v.t. [Lat. caprificus; from caprificus = the wild fig; caper = a wild goat; ficus = fig.]

Bot.: To fertilise by the operation known as caprification.

† cāp-rĭf-ĭ-cā'-tion, s. [Lat. caprificatio; from caprificus = a wild fig; caper = a wild goat; ficus = a fig.] A process of fertilising or accelerating the production of fruit, practised in the Levant, particularly with the wild fig. It consists in suspending on the cultivated fig branches of the wild fig, which bring with them a small insect which penetrates the female flowers, carrying the pollen of the male flower on its body, or punctures the fruit in order to lay its eggs, which hastens the ripening, and may be the only effect. The Egyptians pretend to obtain the same result by puncturing the eye of the fruit with a needle dipped in oil. (Dana in Webster).

"The process of caprification being unknown to these savages, the figs come to nothing."—Bruce: Travels, iii. 74.

cą-prĭf'-ĭ-cŭs, s. [Latin, from caper = a wild goat; ficus = a fig.]

Bot.: A plant—the Wild Fig—which, according to Theophrastus and Pliny, is a tree of a wild kind which never ripens its fruit, but has the power of conferring on other trees the virtue which it does not possess itself. [CAPRIFICATION.]

* cāp'-rĭ-fōle, * cāp-rĭ-fō'-lĭ-ŭm, s. [O. Fr. caprifole; Low Lat. caprifolium; from caper = a wild goat, and folium = a leaf.]

Bot.: The Woodbine, or Honeysuckle (Lonicera Periclymenum), a climbing shrub, the typical genus of the order Caprifoliaceæ, noted for the very fragrant clusters of trumpet-shaped, cream-coloured flowers. [HONEYSUCKLE, WOODBINE.]

"And Eglantine and Caprifole among, Fashioned above within their inmost part."
Spenser: F. Q., III. vi. 44.

căp-rĭ-fō-lĭ-ā'-çē-æ, s. pl. [Low Lat. caprifoli(um); fem. pl. suffix -aceæ.]

Bot.: A natural order of plants, the Honeysuckle family. They are gamopetalous calyciflioral dicotyledons, and are classed by Lindley in his Cinchonal alliance. They are shrubs or trees, generally climbing, and are natives of the northern parts of Europe, Asia, and America. The best-known species is the Common Honeysuckle (Lonicera Periclymenum). The Elder, the Guelder Rose, the Laurustinus, and the Snowberry belong to this family, in which there are sixteen genera and 230 species known.

* cāp'-rĭ-form, a. [Lat. caper = a wild goat; forma = form, shape.] Goat-shaped, resembling a goat in shape or appearance.

* cą-prĭg'-ĕn-ŭs, a. [Lat. caper = a wild goat; gigno (pa. ten. genui) = to beget, produce.] Begotten by a goat.

cāp-rĭ-mŭl'-gĭd-æ, s. pl. [Lat. caprimulgus; fem. pl. suffix -idæ.]

Ornith.: The Goatsuckers, or Night-jars, a family of birds akin to the Swallows (Hirundinidæ) and the Swifts (Cypselidæ), and constituting with them the typical section of the tribe Fissirostres. They have large eyes and soft plumage; the bill is short, depressed, and very broad, with an extremely wide gape. The ears are very large, the wings long and pointed, the legs short. The species are widely spread over the world. There are three sub-families, Caprimulginæ, Podagrinæ, and Steatornithinæ (q.v.). [CAPRIMULGUS.]

cāp-rĭ-mŭl'-gĭ-næ, s. pl. [From Lat. caprimulgus (q.v.), and fem. pl. suff. -inæ.]

Ornith.: The typical sub-family of the family Caprimulgidæ (q.v.). They have a very short and weak bill, and the middle claw pectinated; the precise use of the pectination is matter of dispute. For Caprimulgus europæus see Caprimulgus. C. or Antrostomus vociferus is the Whip-poor-Will of North America, and C. carolinensis the Chuck-Will's-widow, the names being imitated from their notes.

cāp-rĭ-mŭl'-gŭs, s. [Lat. caper = a wild goat; mulgeo = to milk.]

Ornith.: A genus of birds, the typical one of the family Caprimulgidæ, and the sub-family Caprimulginæ. One species, Caprimulgus europæus, is found in Britain. It is called the Goatsucker, from the old and erroneous belief that it sucks goats. Another name given it is Night-jar, from a jarring noise, like that of a rapidly-revolving spinning-wheel, made by the birds when sitting on trees; their note is a different one when flying about in search of droning-beetles and moths, on which they principally live, and which they catch on the wing. They hunt about by night, and the wheel-sound, which strikes up punctually at sunset, is one of the most notable ornithological phenomena presented in Epping Forest on summer evenings. There the bird is called a Night-hawk, as resembling a hawk, or, still better, a gigantic hawk-moth, as it hovers on the wing. Elsewhere it is termed also the Night-churn or Fern Owl.

* cāp'-rine, a. [Lat. caprinus = pertaining to a goat; caper = a wild goat.] Of or pertaining to goats; goat-like.

"Their physiognomy is canine, vulpine, caprine."—Bishop Goodwin: Life of Bishop Brownrigg, p. 258 (in cāp'-rĭ-ŏle, s. [Fr. capriole.]

Horsemanship: A leap in the air without advancing, but in which the animal jerks out its hinder feet.

¶ A capriole is akin to a croupade and a ballotade, but in the former of these movements the horse does not show his shoes, while he does in a capriole, and in the latter of these he does not jerk out his hinder feet.

† cāp'-rĭ-pĕd, a. [Lat. caper = a goat, pes (genit. pedis) = a foot.] Having feet like a goat, goat-footed.

cą-prō'-ic, a. [From Lat. caper = a she-goat, caper = a he-goat, with allusion to Gr. κάπρος (kapros) = a boar, spec. a wild boar.]

caproic acid, s.

Chem.: $C_5H_{11}O_2 = C_5H_{11}.CO.OH$. A monatomic, fatty acid, which occurs as a glyceride in the butter of cow's milk, and in cocoa-nut oil; it is produced by the action of alkalies on amyl-cyanide, and as a sodium salt by the action of CO_2 on sodium amyl. It is a viscid oil, sp. gr. 0·931 at 15°, boils at 195°, solidifies at -5°. Its salts are called caproates, they are soluble and crystallizable. A strong solution of the potassium salts yields, by electrolysis, diamyl $C_{10}H_{22}$.

cāp'-rŏ-mўs, s. [From Gr. κάπρος (kapros) = a boar, spec. the wild boar, and μῦς (mus) = a mouse.]

Zool.: A genus of rodent mammals, family Psammoryctidæ, or Sand-rats. Some of its species, however, inhabit not sand but the branchas of trees. They are found in South America and the West Indies. Some of them have spines mixed with ordinary hairs, and have in consequence been described as porcupines.

cā-prŏs, s. [From Gr. κάπρος (kapros) = a boar.]

Ichthy.: A genus of spiny-finned fishes, family Scomberidæ. Capros aper is the Boar-fish, sometimes called Zeus aper. [BOAR-FISH.]

cā-prўl-āte, s. [From Eng. caprylic, and suff. -ate (Chem.) (q.v.).] [CAPRYLIC ACID.]

cā-prўl-ĭc, a. [Lat. capra = a she-goat; Gr. κάπρος (kapros) = a boar, and ὕλη (hulē) = matter as a principle of being.]

caprylic acid, s.

Chem.: $C_8H_{16}O_2 = C_7H_{15}.CO.OH$. A monatomic, fatty acid, which occurs as a glyceride in butter and in cocoa-nut oil, also in fusel oil. It is prepared by the saponification of cocoa-nut oil; its baryta salt is less soluble in that of caproic acid. Caprylic acid is an pleasant liquid which solidifies at 12°. Boils at 238°. Its salts are called Caprylates.

cāp'-sa, s. [Lat. = a case.]

Zool.: A genus of Mollusca, placed by Cuvier between Venus and Petricola, having two teeth on the one hinge, and a single bifid one on the other; lunula wanting, valves convex, and the fold indicative of the retractor of the foot considerable.

cāp-sĕl'-la, s. [Lat. capsella = a small box or coffer.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, order Cruciferæ.

Capella Bursa pastoris is the Shepherd's Purse so common at roadsides in this country.

cap-si-cine, s. [Lat. capsic(um), and suff. -ine (Chem.).]

Chem.: The active principle extracted from the capsules of cayenne pepper. It has a resinous appearance, and a hot, acrid taste, so pungent that if half a grain of it be volatilized in a large room, it will cause all who respire the contained air to sneeze and cough.

cap-si-cum, s. [Lat. capsa = a case; so named from the seed-pods.]

I. Botany:

1. A genus of plants of the order Solanaceæ, consisting of annual or biennial plants, bearing membranous pods containing several seeds, noted for their hot, pungent qualities. Capsicum annuum, a native of South America, furnishes the fruits known as chilies. These, as well as the fruits of C. frutescens and other species, are used to form cayenne pepper. For this purpose the ripe fruits are dried in the sun or in an oven, and then ground to powder, which is mixed with a large quantity of wheat flour. The mixed powder is then turned into cakes with leaven; these are baked till they become as hard as biscuit, and are then ground and sifted. Cayenne pepper is largely adulterated with red lead and other substances. [CAYENNE.] (Treas. of Bot., &c.)

2. The fruit-pods of the plants described in 1.

II. Pharm.: Capsici Fructus, the dried ripe fruit of Capsicum fastigiatum, imported from Zanzibar. It is a small, oblong, scarlet, membranous pod, divided internally into two or three cells containing numerous flat white-reniform seeds. It has no odour; its taste is hot and acrid. Capsicum fruits are used medicinally, in powder or as a tincture, externally, or as a gargle in cases of malignant sore throat, and internally as a stimulant in cases of impaired digestion.

cap-si ze, v.t. & i. [Etymology unknown. Mahn suggests from cap = head, and seize, because it is properly to move a hogshead or other vessel forwards by turning it alternately on the head. Skeat suggests that it is a nautical corruption of Sp. cabecear = to nod one's head in sleep; from cabeza = the head; from Low Lat. capitium = a cowl, hood; Lat. caput = the head. Cf. Sp. capuzar un bazel = to sink a ship by the head.]

A. Transitive:

1. To upset or overturn any vessel. (Said especially of ships.)

"It is a pleasant voyage perhaps to float,
Like Pyrrho, on a sea of speculation;
But what if carrying sail capsize the boat?"
Byron: Don Juan, IX. 19.

2. To upset, overturn any thing or person.

B. Intrans.: To be upset or overturned.

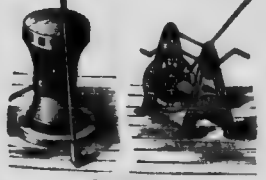
Naut.: A strong, massive apparatus of wood



CAPSTANS.

made to revolve, and shaped like a truncated cone, and having the upper part provided with holes for the reception of bars or levers with which to cause it to revolve, and thus raise a heavy weight by winding a rope round it. It is especially used on shipboard for weighing the anchor. Capstans are single or double, according as they have one or two barrels upon the same spindle. The double capstan is revolved by two sets of men on two decks. They are known as "fore" or "aft" capstans, according to position. The fore capstan stands about midway between the fore and main masts. The aft capstan about the same distance abaft the mainmast. The drum capstan, for weighing heavy anchors, was invented by Sir Samuel Morland about 1661.

"The weighing of anchors by the capstan is also new."—Raleigh: Essays.

2. One of the order of monks described in II.

II. Technically:

1. Ch. Hist.: A branch of the Franciscan order of monks, so called from their peculiar capuche or cowl—a pointed hood attached to the ordinary Franciscan coat, and said to have been worn by St. Francis himself. This branch was founded by Matthew de Baschi, an Italian, but with him may be named the famous Lewis de Fossembrun. The Capuchins sought to restore the original rigour of the institutes of St. Francis, which Pope Innocent IV. had relaxed by granting the right to possess property to the members of the Franciscan order. In 1525 they received the solemn sanction of Pope Clement VII. Because of their severe austerity, and especially for the innovation of the capuche, they were much persecuted by the other Franciscans. Bernardo Ochino—their first Vicar-General—became a Protestant, as, afterwards, did also their third. Eventually, however, they spread in great numbers over Italy, Germany, France, and Spain. In the seventeenth century they showed much zeal in prosecuting missions to Africa. (Mosheim: Ch. Hist., cent. 16, 17.) [FRANCISCANS.]

I. Literally:

*1. The fruit of the Carob-tree, also called carat.

2. Weights and Measures:

(1) A weight of 3¼ grains.

(2) The twenty-fourth part of an ounce. It is used by jewellers to express the fineness of gold, the whole mass being supposed to be divided into twenty-four parts and said to be so many carats fine, according to the number of twenty-fourth parts of pure gold contained in it. Twenty-four carat means all gold, eighteen carat three-quarters gold. Fine gold consists of twenty-two carats of pure gold and two of alloy. The gold coins of the United States are 21·19 carats fine. A dollar weighs 0·13 ounce, an eagle 1·29 ounces. From this, the proportion of gold in each can be calculated.

"A mark, being an ounce Troy, is divided into twenty-four equal parts, called carats; and each carat into four grains: by this weight is distinguished the different fineness of their gold; for if to the finest of gold be put two carats of alloy, both making, when cold, half an ounce, or twenty-four carats, then this gold is said to be twenty-two carats fine."—Cocker.

(3) A weight used by jewellers in weighing diamonds and other precious stones. It is the 150th part of an ounce troy.

car-bal-lyl'-ate, s. [Eng., &c. carballyl(ic); -ate (Chem.) (q.v.).] [CARBALLYLIC ACID.]

car-bal-lyl'-ic, a. [From Eng., &c. carb(on); allyl; -ic.]

Chem.: A term used chiefly or exclusively in the compound which follows.

carballylic acid, s.

Chem.: Tricarballylic acid, $C_6H_8O_6$ = $(C_3H_5)'''(COOH)_3$. A triatomic, tribasic, fatty acid, formed by the action of nascent hydrogen on aconitic acid, or by the action of alcoholic potash on propenyl tricyanide. It forms colourless trimetric crystals, soluble in water and alcohol. Its alkaline salts, called carballylates, are soluble in water. Its melting point is 158°.

car'-be-mate, s. [From Eng., &c. carbam(ic); and -ate (Chem.) (q.v.).]

Chem.: $(CO)''(NH_2)(ONH_4)$. Ammonium carbamate is formed by passing a mixture of perfectly dry carbon dioxide and ammonia gas into cold absolute alcohol, and heating the crystalline deposit with absolute alcohol in a sealed tube to 100°. The liquid, on cooling, deposits ammonium carbamate in crystalline laminæ, which, when heated in a sealed tube to 140°, split into ammonium carbonate and urea. Ammonium carbamate is converted by water into acid ammonium carbonate. It can be distinguished by its precipitating calcium very slowly from a solution of $CaCl_2$ and ammonia.

car-bam'-ic, a. [From Eng., &c. carb(on); and amic (q.v.).]

Chem.: A term used chiefly or exclusively in the compound which follows.

carbamic ethers, s. pl.

Chem.: Both acid and neutral ethers are known.

(1) Acid Ethers: The ethylammonium salt of ethylcarbamic acid.
$(CO)''NH(C_2H_5)ONH_3(C_2H_5)$, a snow-white powder, is obtained by passing CO_2 into anhydrous ethylamine cooled by a freezing mixture.

(2) Neutral Ethers (called also Urethanes): Ethyl carbamate $(CO)''NH_2'OC_2H_5$. It is formed by the action of ammonia on alcohol saturated with carbonyl chloride, also by aqueous ammonia and ethyl carbonate. It forms colourless crystals soluble in water.

car'-be-mide, s. [From Eng., &c. carb(on); and amide (q.v.).] [UREA.]

Chem.: $CN_2H_4O = N_2(CO)''H_4$. It is produced by the action of ammonia gas on carbonyl chloride, or upon ethyl carbonate, also by the decomposition of oxamide at red heat. Carbamide is decomposed by soluble hypobromites and hypochlorites with evolution of nitrogen, as $CN_2H_4O \times O_3 = CO_2 \times 2H_2O \times N_2$.

car'-be-mine, s. [From Eng., &c. carb(on); and amine,] [AMINE, s.]

Chem.: Isocyanide. These compounds are obtained by distilling a mixture of an alcoholic ammonia base and chloroform with alcoholic potash. They are oily, stinking liquids. The isocyanides of phenyl, ethyl, and amyl are known.

cár-bé-nés-ọ, s. [Lat. carbasus; Gr. κάρβασος (karbasos) = flax, linen, a sail.]

Zool.: A partial synonym of the Cheilostomatous genus, Flustra (q.v.). Flustra carbasea, formerly Carbasea papyrea, the Lawn Sea-mat of Ellis, is a delicate Northern form living on shells and stones in rather deep water. The cells are in many rows on one side only, and the polypide has about twenty tentacles. It may often be found on the shore.

car-be'-nó-tāte, s. [From Eng., &c. carb(on); azot(ic); and suff. -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of carbazotic acid.

car-be-nót'-ic, a. [From Eng., &c. carb(on); and azotic (q.v.).]

Chem.: A term used chiefly or exclusively in the compound which follows.

carbazotic acid, s. [Carbon, azote = nitrogen.]

Chem.: Trinitrophenol, Nitrophenisic acid, Picric acid, trinitrum (pikros) = bitter, $C_6H_3N_3O_7$ = $C_6H_2(NO_2)_3OH$. Prepared from the impure nitrophenesic acid. It is also obtained by the action of nitric acid and indigo, silk, wool, resin, &c. It crystallises in yellow crystals, soluble in water, has a very bitter taste, and dyes silk and wool yellow, but does not dye cotton, hemp, and flax. Its salts are called picrates. Potassium picrate is very slightly soluble in water; when heated it explodes with great energy. Carbazotic acid is a nitro-substitution compound of phenol.

car'-bide, s. [From Eng., &c. carb(on); and suff. -ide (Chem.) (q.v.).]

Chem.: A compound formed by the union of carbon with an element, as iron or hydrogen.

car'-bin, cair-ban, * car-fin, s. (Scotch.) [Gael. cairbean.] The basking-shark, Squalus maximus, L.

car'-bine, car'-bine, * cär-ọ-bine, s. & a. [O. Fr. carabin; Fr. carabine; Ital. carabino = a little gun, corrupted from O. Fr. calabrin, calabrin = a light-armed soldier; O. Fr. calabre, crable = an engine of war; from Low Lat. chatabula = a catapult; Gr. καταβολή (katabolē) = a throwing down, destruction: κατά (kata) = down; βολή (bolē) = a throwing; βάλλω (ballō) = to throw.]

A. As substantive:

Military:

* 1. A musketeer, a carbineer.

"When he was taken, all the rest they fled,
And our carbines pursued them to the death."
Kyd: Spanish Tragedy.

2. A short fire-arm, used by cavalry, artillery, in the navy, &c., similar in bore and nature to, and carrying the same ammunition as, the infantry rifle. Except with cavalry, furnished with a sword-bayonet to increase its length as an offensive weapon. It is in general use by United States cavalry, which are all of light equipment, and adapted to serve as infantry on occasion. In such cases the carbine proves a highly useful arm. Colt's, Sharpe's, and other makes of carbines are used.

1. CARBINE. 2. CARBINE-LOCK.

"... continued to fly on foot, throwing away carbines, swords, and even coats as incumbrances."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

B. As adj.: (See the compounds).

carbine-lock, s. The lock of a carbine.

"Sling on thy bugle—see that free from rust,
My carbine-lock springs worthy of my trust."
Byron: The Corsair, i. 7.

carbine-thimble, s. A stiff leathern socket, secured to a D-ring on the off-side of the saddle by a strap and buckle. It receives the muzzle of the horseman's carbine.

car-bin-ēēr, cär-ọ-bin-ēēr, s. [Fr. carabinier.]

Mil.: Formerly applied to mounted infantry armed with a short carbine, and intended to fight on foot. Name still retained in England by the 6th Dragoon Guards.

car'-bin-ōl, s. [From Lat. carbo (gen. carbonis) (?), and Eng., &c. (alcohol.]

Chem.: A name given to methyl alcohol, $C(OH)H_3$, by Kolbe, and the alcohols formed from it, by substitution of methyl, ethyl, &c., for an atom of hydrogen, are named according to the radicals which they contain, as Dimethyl carbinol, or Tertiary Quartyl alcohol, $C(OH)(CH_3)_3$.

car'-bin-yl, s. [From Eng., &c., carb(ol) and -yl.]

Chem.: The name given to the alcohol radicals of the corresponding carbinols, as Dimethyl carbinol $C(CH_3)_2H.OH$ contains the radical Dimethyl-carbinyl $(C(CH_3)_2H)$.

car bō, s. [Lat. = coal, from the jet black colour of its wings.]

Ornith.: An old synonym of Phalacrocorax (q.v.).

car-bō'-cēr-ite, s. [Eng. carb(on), and cerite (q.v.).]

Min.: Carbonate of cerium, also called Lanthanite (q.v.). It consists of oxide of cerium, 75·7; carbonic acid, 16·8; water 13·5. Sp. gr., 2·605–2·696. Hardness, 2·5. It occurs at Bastnäs in Sweden, and also in Silurian limestone in Saucon Valley, Lehigh Co., Pennsylvania.

car bōl'-ic, a. [From Eng., &c. carb(on), (alcohol); and Eng. suff. -ic.

Chem.: Pertaining to, or derived from, carbon.

carbolic acid, s.

Chem.: $C_6H_5'OH$ = Phenyl Alcohol, Phenol, Phenic Acid, Coal-tar Creasote. Phenol is not technically an acid, but a secondary monatomic aromatic alcohol, obtained by the dry distillation of salicylic acid, and formed, by the dry distillation of coal, in the coal-tar oil. When pure it forms white deliquescent crystals melting at 35° to an oily liquid, which boils at 184°. It has a penetrating odour and burning taste; it is neutral; it coagulates albumen and has powerful antiseptic properties. It is used as a disinfectant, and to preserve meat, &c. It dissolves in alkalies, forming compounds called phenates. Potassium phenate crystallises in white needles: when it is heated with iodides of ethyl, methyl, &c., double ethers are formed, as methyl-phenate $C_6H_5OCH_3$. Chlorine, bromine, iodine, and nitric acid form with it substitution compounds. [CHLOROPHENESIC ACID, CARBAZOTIC ACID.] Phenol is benzine with one molecule of (OH) substituted for one atom of H.

car'-bō-lize, v.t. [Eng. carbol(ic); -ize.] To impregnate with carbolic acid.

car-bón, s. [Fr. carbone; from Lat. carbo = a coal.]

Chem.: A tetrad non-metallic element, symbol C. Atomic weight, 12. Carbon occurs in three allotropic forms: two crystalline (Diamond and graphite), and one amorphous (Wood coal). Diamond crystallises in forms belonging to the regular system. It is transparent, either colourless, or yellow, pink, blue, or green. The hardest substance known, refracts light strongly, is infusible, but is burnt at CO_2 in oxygen gas at white heat. Sp. gr., It is a non-conductor of electricity. It is found in gravel in India, Brazil, &c. [DIAMOND.] Graphite crystallises in six-sided prisms. Sp. gr., 2·3. It is grey-black with a metallic lustre. It is a good conductor of electricity. Graphite often separates in scales from melted iron; it is used for lead pencils, it is often called black-lead. [GRAPHITE.] Amorphous carbon occurs more or less pure in lampblack, wood charcoal, coal, coke, and animal charcoal. Sp. gr. from 1·6 to 2. It is porous, absorbs gases, removes colour from organic liquids, is used as a disinfectant, and burns in the air at red heat, forming CO_2. When boiled with H_2SO_4, it is oxidised to CO_2, and SO_2 is also formed, which escape in gas used as a reducing agent. Carbon forms two oxides with oxygen, CO and CO_2, carbonic oxide and carbonic anhydride.

carbon-battery, *

Elect.: [BUNSEN-BATTERY.]

carbon chlorides, *

Chem.: Carbon monochloride. This compound has been discovered to be hexa-chlor-benzene C_6Cl_6 by determination of its vapour denser. It is obtained by passing the vapour of chloroform through a red-hot tube. It forms white silky needles, melting at 236°, and boiling at 331°.

Carbon-dichloride, C_2Cl_4 = $\begin{matrix} Cl & Cl \\ | & | \\ Cl-C & C-Cl \end{matrix}$ analogous to ethene, obtained by passing the vapour of carbon-trichloride through a red-hot tube. It is a colourless liquid. Sp. gr., 1·6. It boils at 117°.

Carbon-trichloride, C_2Cl_6 = $\begin{matrix} Cl & Cl \\ \diagdown & \diagup \\ C-Cl \\ | \\ C-Cl \\ \diagup & \diagdown \\ Cl & Cl \end{matrix}$ analogous to ethane, obtained by placing ethene chloride into a glass vessel containing Cl and exposing it to sunshine. A white crystalline aromatic substance melting at 160°, and boiling at 182°.

Carbon tetrachloride, CCl_4 = $\begin{matrix} Cl \\ | \\ Cl-C-Cl \\ | \\ Cl \end{matrix}$

A colourless liquid, sp. gr. 1·56, and boiling at 77°, obtained by passing the vapour of Cl and CS_2 through a red-hot tube, and distilling the liquid formed with potash. Also formed by the action of Cl on CH_4 in direct sunlight. By the action of sodium amalgam on its alcoholic solution the atoms of Cl are replaced by atoms of hydrogen.

Chem.: Carbonic acid gas, Carbonic anhydride, Carbonic oxide (of some chemists) = CO_2. Carbon dioxide is a colourless gas 1·524 times as heavy as air, and 22 times as heavy as hydrogen. It is evolved in large quantities from fissures in active and extinct volcanic districts. It is given off in the process of fermentation, from decaying animal and vegetable matter and by animals during respiration, and it contaminates crowded rooms. It accumulates also in the bottom of pits and wells, and forms a great part of the afterdamp or choke-damp of coal mines. It is also contained in most waters from springs, and water charged with it has the power of dissolving carbonates of calcium, magnesium, and iron. It is always produced when carbonaceous matter is burnt in excess of air or oxygen. It has an agreeable pungent odour, but it cannot be respired, as it produces insensibility and death. It extinguishes the flame of a lighted taper. At the pressure of 38·5 atmospheres at 0° it is converted into a colourless limpid liquid insoluble in water, but soluble in ether and alcohol; it solidifies, on exposure to the air, into a snow-white mass, which is a bad conductor of heat; when mixed with ether it is used as a freezing mixture. Carbon dioxide exists in the air, and is decomposed by the green leaves of plants, which retain the carbon and liberate oxygen in sunlight. About four volumes of CO_2 are contained in 10,000 volumes air. The total quantity is estimated at about three billions of tons. Cold water dissolves about its own volume of carbon dioxide, whatever be the density of the gas with which it is in contact, the solution reddens blue litmus paper, and converts oxides of the alkaline and alkaline earth metals into carbonates (q.v.). Carbon dioxide is contained in aerated waters and in sparkling wines. Carbon dioxide can be obtained by burning carbon in excess of oxygen; but by passing CO_2 over red-hot charcoal it is converted into carbon monoxide. Carbon dioxide is usually prepared by decomposing a carbonate with one of the stronger acids, as by the action of hydrochloric acid on marble, which gives calcium chloride, water, and CO_2. Carbon dioxide can be distinguished by its giving a white precipitate when passed into a solution of lime or baryta water, by its quick absorption by caustic alkalies, and by its extinguishing the flame of a lighted taper. [CARBONATE.] Carbon dioxide is decomposed by heating potassium in it, forming an oxide and liberating carbon.

carbon disulphide, s. [BISULPHIDE OF CARBON.]

carbon holders, s. pl.

Elec.: Clamps for holding the carbons in electric arc lights.

Elect: The light produced between and upon two carbon points, between which passes a current of electricity. [ELECTRIC LIGHT.]

carbon monoxide, s.

Chem.: Carbonous oxide, Carbonic oxide, Carbonyl = CO". Carbon monoxide is a colourless, inodorous, tasteless gas, insoluble in water, sp. gr. 0·967. It burns with a light-blue flame, forming CO_2. It is intensely poisonous, even when mixed with large quantities of air, producing faintness, insensibility, and death. It is formed when CO_2 is passed over red-hot charcoal, also by heating oxalic acid $C_2H_2O_4$ with sulphuric acid, which decomposes it into H_2O, CO_2, and CO. The CO_2 is removed by passing the gas through lime-water. It unites with KHO at high temperatures, forming formiate of potassium. It unites with Cl when exposed to sunlight, forming phosgene gas $COCl_2$. Carbon monoxide can also be formed by heating powdered ferrocyanide of potassium with ten times its weight of concentrated sulphuric acid. Carbon monoxide (Carbonyl) in organic chemistry acts as a diatomic radical.

Chem.: Phosgene gas, Carbonyl chloride, $COCl_2$. Obtained by exposing dry CO and Cl_2 to direct sunlight, also by passing carbon monoxide into boiling antimony pentachloride, and by the oxidation of chloroform. It is collected over mercury. It condenses into a liquid at 0°. It is decomposed by water forming carbon dioxide and hydrochloric acid. Treated with dry ammonia gas NH_3, it forms urea $CO(NH_2)_2$, or ammonium chloride.

carbon-paper, s. Paper coated on one side with a substance which, under pressure, adheres to a blank sheet placed next to it. Used for manifolding on a typewriter or otherwise.

Photog.: A photographic process introduced by Poitevin in 1855. It is as follows: Paper is coated with a compound of bichromate of potasse gelatine, and lamp-black, in cold distilled water; this is allowed to dry in a dark room, subsequently exposed between a negative for a few minutes, according to the character of the solution and of the light, then dissolving off with hot water the parts not affected by the actinic action of the light. The picture resulting from this treatment is a positive print in black and white, of which the shades are produced by the carbon of the lamp-black. Poitevin also introduced various colours into the same process. Poitévin, later, introduced another process for carbon-printing under a positive. The paper is floated in a bath of gelatine dissolved in lukewarm water and coloured with lamp-black. Such paper is sensitized in a dark room by immersion in a solution of sesquichloride of iron and tartaric acid. This renders the gelatine insoluble, even in boiling water. The sheets are dried and exposed under transparent positives in the printing-frame. The parts of the film acted upon by light become insoluble in hot water, the iron salts, under the influence of light, being reduced by the tartaric acid, restoring the organic matter to its natural solubility. The sheet is then washed in hot water, which removes the ferruginous compound and develops the picture. Improvements were subsequently introduced by Swann, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in 1861, and others.

Chem.: $CSCl_2$, a yellow, irritating liquid, decomposed by potash into K_2S, K_2CO_3, and CCl_4. It is not acted upon by water. It is obtained by the action of dry chlorine on carbon disulphide.

carbon tool-point, s. An application of the diamond to mechanical purposes. These points are used to point, edge, or face tools for drilling, reaming, sawing, planing, turning, shaping, carving, engraving, and dressing flint, grindstones, whet-stones, emery, corundum, tantc, or tripoli wheels, iridium, nickel, enamel, crystals, glass, porcelain, china, steel, hardened or otherwise, chilled iron, copper, or other metals. Twenty-eight forms of it are figured in Knight's Practical Dictionary of Mechanics car-bō-nā'-çē-ŏŭs, a. [From Lat. carbo (genit. carbonis) = charcoal, and Eng. suffix -aceous, from Lat. suffix -aceus.]

Min. & Geol.: Consisting mainly of carbon, the simple element of charcoal.

¶ In geology the term is applied to strata wholly or in large part formed by the accumulation of such vegetable material as sunken forests, massed drift-wood, turf, and mosses. Coal, lignite, and peat have hydrogen as well as carbon in their composition, and often mineral impurities. Anthracite and graphite (metamorphosed coal) consist of nearly pure carbon. Diamond is pure carbon. Bituminous shales, fossil pitch, petroleum, and naphtha are some other of the carbonaceous materials found in the earth. In exceptional cases the carbon of carbonaceous rocks may be of animal origin, thus the oily matter with which the bituminous shales of Carlinneas are impregnated seems to have been derived from the decomposition of fossil fishes rather than of plants.

car-bō-nā'-do, car-bō-nā'-dō, s. [Fr. carbonnade; from O. Fr. carbon; Lat. carbo (genit. carbonis) = charcoal.] A piece of fish, flesh, or fowl, cut in slices, seasoned, and broiled.

"If I come in his way willingly, let him make a carbonado of me. —Shakesp.: 1 Henry IV., v. 4.

car-bō-nā'-dōed, car-bō-nā'-dōed, pa. par. or a. [CARBONADE, v.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb).

B. As subst: The act or process of slicing fish, &c., and broiling it over the coals.

car-bō-nā'-do, s. [CARBONADE.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The same as CARBONADE.

2. Min.: Large pebbles or masses of diamonds, occasionally 1,000 carats in weight. They consist of pure carbon, excepting 0·27—2·07 per cent. (Dana.) A variety of the diamond. (Brit. Mus. Cat.)

car-bō-nā'-dō, v.t. [CARBONADO, s.]

2. Fig.: To hack, cut to pieces.

"Draw, you rogue, or I'll so carbonado Your shanks." —Shakesp.: King Lear, ii. 2.

car-bō-na'-ĭ-ăn, s. [Carbonari(i), -ism.] The principles of the Carbonari.

car-bō-na'-ro (pl. carbonari), s. [Ital. carbonaro = a collier.] A member of a secret association established in Italy in the beginning of the present century, with the object of setting up a republic. The Carbonari took charcoal [Ital. carbone] as their symbol of purification, and adopted as their motto, "Revenge on the wolves who devour the lambs." The origin of the society is uncertain.

car bŏn'-āte, s. [From Eng. carbon(ic); and suff. -ate (Chem.) (q.v.)]

Chem.: Carbonates are salts. The corresponding acid, H_2CO_3, is not known in a free state; it may be formed when CO_2 is dissolved in water; it is dibasic; the carbonates of the alkaline metals are soluble in water, and are either acid or neutral salts according as one or both atoms of H are replaced, as $KHCO_3$ and K_2CO_3. The acid salts are often called bicarbonates. The carbonates of the other metals are insoluble. Basic carbonates are mixtures of carbonates and oxides. Carbonates liberate CO_2 when treated with an acid, which may be recognised by passing it into a solution of baryta water, in which it throws down a white precipitate of $BaCO_3$, soluble in HCl. Carbonic acid may be theoretically considered to have this formula and belong to the lactic acid series—

$$C(\begin{matrix} OH \\ O'' \\ OH \end{matrix})$$

car'-bŏn-ā-tĕd, a. [CARBONATE.]

Chem.: Combined or impregnated with carbonic acid. Carbonated water is either pure or holding various saline matters in solution, impregnated with carbonic acid gas. For general sale in this country the water contains a little soda, which being charged with the gas is called soda-water. (Ure: Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.) car-bŏn'-ĭc, car-bŏn'-ĭck, a. [Eng. carbon, -ic.] Containing carbon, pertaining to carbon.

"Corn and particularly wheat, contains more of the carbonick principle than grasses."—Kirwan: On Manures, i. 12.

1. Chem. & Old. Lang.: The old but still well-known name for what is called by modern chemists carbon dioxide (q.v.).

2. Physiol.: Air exhaled from the lungs is saturated with moisture, and, moreover, contains about 4·35 per cent. of carbonic acid. The amount is increased by active exercise. By breathing the same air again and again, it is possible to increase the carbonic acid to about 10 per cent., but with very deleterious effects. Air in which animals had been suffocated was found by Mr. Courthope to contain 12·75 per cent. of carbonic acid, but less than half that amount (5 to 6 per cent.) will endanger life.

Carbonic acid engine:

1. An engine driven by the expansive power of condensed carbonic acid gas.

2. A machine for impregnating water with carbonic acid gas as a beverage.

3. A form of fire-engine, in which water is ejected by the pressure due to the evolution of carbonic acid in a closed chamber over water, or in which carbonic acid is ejected with the water, to assist in extinguishing the fire by the exclusion of oxygen from it.

carbonic oxide, s. The old name for carbon monoxide (q.v.).

car-bŏn-if'-ĕr-ŏŭs, a. [Lat. carbo (genit. carbonis) = coal; fero = to bear, produce, and Eng. suff. -ous.]

Geol.: A term applied to the extensive and thick series of strata with which seams of palæozoic coal are more or less immediately associated. It is applied as well to that great system of formations which yield our main supply of coal as to some divisions of that system, such as the Carboniferous Limestone and the Carboniferous Slates (of Ireland). It is also applied to the fossils found in any stratum belonging to the system.

carboniferous system or formation, s.

Geol.: The Carboniferous succeeds the Old Red Sandstone or some other member of the Devonian system, and passes upwards into the Permian series. Its constituent groups vary much in the thicknesses of their sandstones, clays, limestone, and coals in different parts of the country, according to their conditions of deposition in conterminous seas, estuaries, and lagoons.

The Carboniferous System attains a great development in the United States, the strata being divided into two groups, the lower or sub-Carboniferous, and the Carbonif'rous, comprising the millstone grit and the coal measures. According to Professor Dana the coal-bearing area of North America is approximately as follows:

	Sq. miles.
Rhode Island area	500
Alleghany area	59,000
Michigan area	6,700
Illinois, Indiana, West Kentucky	47,000
Missouri, Iowa, Kansas, Arkansas, Texas,	78,000
Nova Scotia and New Brunswick	18,000

The Carboniferous System is strongly developed in England and Ireland and parts of Europe. China possesses extensive deposits.

Carboniferous fossils comprise labyrinthodont and other amphibia; heterocercal fishes of many forms; numerous insects, myriapods, and arachnids; crustaceans (including the last of the trilobites and the eurypterids) of all orders except the highest decapods; molluscs of all the known orders; polyzoa; corals of the "rugose" kind; foraminifera; and some plants of the conifer and cycad groups, but far more of the fern, equisetum, and lycopod orders.

The Carboniferous Limestone consists of the corals, encrinites, shells, and foraminifera of a great sea, with muds, sands, and coal-beds on its margins, both at first (Tuedian), and afterwards (Yoredale). These constitute the coal-measures of Russia, Styria, Italy, Corsica, the Boulonnais, &c., and the Lower Coal-measures of Scotland.

The Millstone Grit next formed, in shallow water, of widespread sheets of sand and shingle, has a few scattered fossil plants and shells, and thin seams of coal.

"Measures" is a mining term for strata, retained for the coal-measures, which consist of numerous successive groups of (1) clay, (2) coal, (3) shale, and (4) sandstone, each varying from a few inches to some feet in thickness. These originated as maritime flats with luxuriant jungles, subjected to inundations of fresh and brackish waters, with mud and sand, and sometimes of sea-water, leaving a limestone of sea-shells.

The thick forests of gigantic lycopods, equisetes, and ferns covered their floors with accumulated exuvia, and thick layers of each season's spore-dust. Storms tore down the clustered trunks, and covered them with the mud and sand of inundations. (Dodal.)

The "underclay," or "seat-earth," under each coal-seam was the soil in which the trees (Sigillaria, Lepidodendron, and Calamites) grew, and is a pure clay used for fire-bricks, encaustic tiles, &c.

The "roof-shale" over the coal, forming a tough roof to the galleries in mining, was brought by floods, together with its water-logged fern-fronds and trunks and branches of the larger plants. This and other shales ("batt," &c.) contain some beds of Anthracosia and other aquatic molluscs, also a few land shells, numerous entomostraca, and some higher crustacea, a few arachnida, insects, and myriapoda, with occasional amphibia, and abundant remains of heterocercal fishes. These fossils are often imbedded in ironstone, concreted in the shales.

Thick sand-drifts, of frequent occurrence, formed the sandstones ("post," &c.), containing scattered plant-remains. (Prof. T. R. Jones, F.R.S.) car-bŏn-i-zā'-tion, car-bŏn-i-zā'-tion, s. [Eng. carboniz(e); -ation.] The act or process of carbonizing, or converting into carbon. (Ure.) car'-bŏn-ize, car-bŏn-ize, v.t. [Eng. carbon; -ize.] To convert into carbon by the action of fire or acids.

car'-bŏn-ized, car-bŏn-ized, pa. par. or a. [Carbonize.]

car'-bŏn-i-zer, car-bŏn-i-zer, s. [Eng. carboniz(e); -er.] A tank or vessel containing benzole or other suitable liquid hydrocarbon, and through which air or gas is passed, in order to carry off an inflammable vapour. [Carburetor.]

car'-bŏn-iz-ing, car'-bŏn-iz-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [Carbonize.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As substan.: The act or process of converting into carbon; carbonization.

carbonizing-furnace, s. An apparatus for carbonizing wood, disintegrating rocks, &c. It is composed of a furnace or fire-chamber, movable upon a stationary frame, both vertically and horizontally, and provided with a nozzle by which the flame is directed upon the object.

car-bŏn-ŏm'-ĕ-tĕr, s. [Eng. carbon, connective, and meter.] An instrument for detecting the presence of an excess of carbonic acid by its action on lime-water. (Webster.) car'-bŏn-ous, a. [Eng. carbon; -ous.] The same as Carbonic (q.v.).

car'-bŏn-yl, s. & a. [From Lat., &c. carbon = charcoal, and Gr. ὕλη (hulē) = . . . matter as a principle of being.] A diatomic radical having the formula CO''.

carbonyl chloride, s. [Carbon oxychloride.]

car-bō tri -ə-mine, s. [From Eng. carbo(n); Lat. prefix tri = three, and Eng. amine.] [Amines.]

Chem.: Guanidine, CH_5N_3 or $C{\equiv}\begin{cases}NH_2\\NH'\\NH_2\end{cases}$

An organic base produced by the action of ammonia on chloropicrin, also by heating cyanamide, CH_2N_2, in alcoholic solution with ammonium chloride. Also by oxidizing guanine with HCl and $KClO_3$. Guanidine forms colourless crystals, forming an alkaline solution with water, which absorbs CO_2. Guanidine boiled with baryta water yields ammonia and urea. Methyl, phenyl, &c. guanidines are known. (See Watts: Dict. of Chemistry.) car-bŏv'-in-ate, s. [From Eng. carborin(ic), and suff. -ate (Chem.).] A salt of carbovinic acid.

car-bō-vin'-ic, a. [From Eng. carbo(n), and vinic (q.v.).]

carbovinic acid, s. The same as Ethyl carbonic acid (q.v.).

car'-bŏy, s. [Corrupted from Port. garafão = a large flagon.] A large globular glass vessel, protected with wicker-work, and used for containing sulphuric acid and other corrosive liquids.

"Boil the whole . . . set it aside in a sealed . . . bay before it be bottled. Stir it well, and set it to . . . in carboys."—Ure: A Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

car'-bŭn-cle, car-bŭn-cle, char-bun-cle, char-bun-le, car-bun-le, char-bun-cle, char-bun-cle, char-bon-cle, s. [Fr. escarboucle; Ital. carbonchio; Sp. carbunco, carbuncho; Port. carbunculo; all from Lat. carbunculus = a little coal: dimin. of carbo = a coal.]

1. Min.: A precious stone, a variety of garnet, of a deep-red colour, found in the East Indies. When held up to the sun its deep tinge becomes exactly the colour of burnin coal. In the Middle Ages it was popularly supposed to have the power of giving out light. It is cut in a form called concave cabochon.

"The stone noblest of alle
The which that men carbuncle alle."
Gower, C. A.

"And they set in it four rows of stones: the first row was a sardius, a topaz, and a carbuncle."
Exod. xxxix. 10.

2. Script: The carbuncle of Exod. xxviii. 10, Heb. נֹפֶךְ (bareketh), and that of Ezek. xxxviii. 13, Heb. נֹפֶךְ (barkath), is probably the emerald; that of Is. liv. 12, Heb. פַּדְּחַת (ekdachh), is an unidentified flashing gem.

3. Med.: A malignant boil or ulcer, forming a hard round tumour, and differing from an ordinary boil in having no core.

 car-bŭn'-cled, a. [Carbuncle.]

1. Set with carbuncles.

"An armour all of gold; it was a king's
—He has deserv'd it; worn it carbuncled
Like holy Phœbus' car."
Shakesp.: Ant. & Cleop., iv. 4.

2. Affected or marked with carbuncles; suffering from a carbuncle.

car-bŭn'-eq-lar, a. [Eng. carbuncle; -ar.] Of or pertaining to a carbuncle; of the nature of a carbuncle. (Johnson.)

 car-bŭn'-eq-late, a. [Lat. carbunculatus, pa. par. of carbunculo = (1) to suffer from carbuncles; (2) (of plants) = to be blasted.]

O. Bot.: Blasted by excessive heat or cold.

 car-bŭn-eq-lā'-tion, s. [Lat. carbunculatio; from carbunculo = (1) to suffer from carbuncles, (2) (of plants) = to be blasted.] The blasting of the young buds of trees or plants, either by excessive heat or excessive cold. (Harris.)

 car-bŭn'-eq-lyne, a. [Lat. carbunculus, and Eng. suff. -yne = -ine.] Full of red pebbles or clods.

"Black orthe is apte, and londe *carbuncle*yne."
Palladius, xii. 29.

 car'-bu-rĕt, car'-bu-rĕt, s. [From Eng., &c. carbon, and suff. -uret (Chem.) (q.v.).]

Chem.: A compound formed by the combination of carbon with another substance.

car-bu-rĕt'-ĕd, a. [Eng. carburet; -ed.]

Chem.: Combined with carbon, or with carbon in solution. The gas known to miners as fire-damp is pure carburetted hydrogen.

car-bu-rĕt'-tor, car-bu-rĕt'-ŏr, s. [Eng. carburet; -or.]

Chem.: An apparatus for making carburetted gas through which coal-gas, hydrogen, or air is passed through or over a liquid hydrocarbon to increase or confer the illuminating power. They may be said to be of two kinds, the object of the purpose differs rather than the construction: (1) for enriching gas, (2) for carburetting air. The former of the two was the primary idea; the latter was suggested as the matter was developed.

car-bu-ri-zā'-tion, s. [From Eng. carburet; -ize; and -ation.]

Of iron: The act of combining it with carbon with the view of converting it into steel.

car'-bŷl, s. [From Eng. carb(on), and Gr. ὕλη (hulē) = . . . matter as a principle of being.] (See compound.)

carbyl-sulphate, s. [Ethionic Oxide.]

car-eq-jou (j as zh), s. [N. Amer. Indian.]

Zoology: 1. The Glutton (Gulo luscus).

2. The American Badger Meles labradorica.
3. Wrongly applied to the Canadian Lynx.

†car-ca-net (Eng.),  car-cant (Scotch), s. [A diminutive of Fr. carcan = a chain or collar; Dut. herkend; Low Lat. carcannum, cf. Icel. kverk (in comp. hverka) = the throat.]

1. A jewelled chain or collar

"Round thy neck in orbicle rins Make a carcanet of rays."
Tennyson: Adeline, 8.

2. A pendant ornament of the head.

"Upon their foreheaves they did bete Targets and tablets of trim works, Pendants and carcants shining cleir."
Watson's Tasso, lib. xix.

car-case, * car-cais, * car-cays, * car-cese, * car-keys, * car-kesse, * car-kess, s. & a. [O. Fr. carquaise = "a carkasse or dead corps" (Cotgrave); Fr. carcasse; Ital. carcasa = a bomb, a shell; carcasso = a quiver, hulk; Sp. carcasa; Low Lat. tarcasius = a quiver; Pers. tarkash = a quiver.]

car-çin-ō-ma, s. [Lat. carcinoma; from Gr. καρκινωμα (karkinōma); from καρκινος (karkinos) = a crab, a cancer.]

1. Med.: A name given to cancer, owing to a certain resemblance which some forms of the disease present to a crab. [CANCER.]

"When this process commences it is in that stage which has been denominated carcinoma, or cancer."—Copland: Dictionary of Practical Medicine.

2. Bot.: A disease in trees when the bark separates; an acrid sap exuding and ulcerating the surrounding parts.

car-çin-ō-ma-ŏ-tōde, a. [Lat. carcinoma; Gr. καρκινωμα (karkinōma), genit. καρκινωματος (karkinōmatos); and Eng. suff. -ous.] Of or pertaining to carcinoma or cancer. (Ash, &c.) car-çin-us, s. [Gr. καρκινος (karkinos) = a crab, a cancer.]

1. Pathol.: A cancer.

2. Zool.: A genus of short-tailed Crustacea. Carcinus Mœnas is a small crab common around the shores of Britain. It is eaten by the poor, but is not equal to the larger crab, Cancer pagurus (q.v.).

card (1), s. & a. [Fr. carte; Ital. & Sp. carta, Ger karte; Dut. kaart; from Lat. charta; all = paper.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) Gen.: A piece of pasteboard, or material made of several sheets of paper united.

(2) Specially:

(a) A small oblong piece of fine pasteboard, on which is printed a person's name and (sometimes) address, to be left by visitors calling at a house.

"Our first cards were to Carabas House. My Lady's son returned by a great big flunky; and I leave you to fancy my poor Betsy's discomfiture as the liveried house maid took in the cards, and Lady de Richmond's driven away, though she actually saw me as the drawing-room window."—Thackeray: Book of Snobs, ch. xxviii.

(b) The same as Postal-card (q.v.).

(c) The same as II. 1 (q.v.).

(d) The programme of any sports, especially

[redacted]

"The card was a pretty good one, and the stands and rings received a fair amount of patronage."—Daily Telegraph, May 11, 1881.

¶ On the cards: Possible. (Colloquial.)

2. Fig.: An indicator or guide.

"On life's vast ocean diversely we sail, Reason the card, but passion is the gale."
Pope: Essay on Man, ii. 108.

¶ To speak by the card: To be very exact or careful in one's words.

"How absolute the knave is: we must speak by the card, or equivocation will undo us."—Shakesp.: Hamlet, v. 1.

II. Technically:

1. Games:

(1) One of a number of small oblong pieces of thin pasteboard marked with divers points and figures, and used in games of chance or skill.

"Soon as she spreads her hand th aerial guard Descend, and sit on each important card."
Pope: Rape of the Lock, iii. 32.

¶ Playing-cards were probably invented in the East. In Italy they originally bore the name of Naibi, and they are still, in Spain and Portugal, called Naipes, signifying, in the Eastern languages, divination. Cards were first painted by hand. The art of printing cards was discovered in Germany between 1350 and 1360. It has been stated that cards were in use in Spain in 1332. In 1387, John I., king of Castille, prohibited their use. In France card-playing was practised in 1361, and at the end of the fourteenth century we find Charles VI. amusing himself with cards during his illness. The figures on modern cards are of French origin, and are said to have been invented between 1430 and 1461.

(2) Pl.: A game played with such cards.

(3) A piece in the game of dominoes.

2. Navt.: A circular sheet of paper on which the points of the compass are marked.

"The very ports they blow,
All the quarters that they know,
I' th' shipman's card."
Shakesp.: Macbeth, i. 3.

"The while their wives do sit Beside them, carding wool."
May: Virgil.

II. Figuratively:

1. To clean or clear, to expurgate.

"If it be carded with covertise."—P. Plowman (1362)

"This book must be carded and purged."—Shelton: Don Quixote.

* 2. To mix, mingle.

"It is an excellent drink for a consumption to be drunk either alone, or carded with some other beer."—Bacon: Natural and Experimental History.

3. To scold sharply. (Scotch.) car-dam'-i-né, s. [Gr. καρδαμίνη (kardamínē), a dimin. of καρδάμωμον (kardámōmon) = water cress, from the taste of the leaves.]

Bot.: An extensive genus of herbaceous cruciferous plants, of which four species are British. Cardamine pratensis, the Cuckoo-flower or Lady's-smock, is a common but pretty meadow-plant, with large pale lilac flowers. A double variety is sometimes found wild. C. hirsuta is a common weed everywhere, varying in size, according to soil, from six to eighteen inches in height. The leaves and flowers of this species form an agreeable salad. This species produces young plants from the leaves, all that is necessary being to place them on a moist grassy or mossy surface. Cardamine amara is also not unfrequent.

card'-ə-mŏm, s. [Lat. cardamomum; from Gr. καρδάμωμον (kardámōmon).]

1. Bot.: [Amomum.]

2. Comm., &c.: The aromatic tonic seeds of various zingiberaceous plants, as Elettaria cardamomum, and Amomum cardamomum, which, besides their medicinal use, form an ingredient in curries, sauces, &c.

"The cardamoms of commerce are produced by the Alpinia cardamomum, a plant of the order Zingiberaceæ (Ginger-wort). In Eastern Bengal the fruit of the A. aromaticum is similarly employed."—Lindl.: Veget. Kingd. (1847), pp. 166-7.

3. Pharm. (pl. cardamoms): Cardamomum is the seed of Elettaria cardamomum, a native of Malabar, an endogenous plant belonging to the order Zingiberaceæ. The dark coloured triangular seeds are contained in oblong triangular capsules of a light-yellow colour. The seeds have a fragrant odour and an aromatic taste. They are used in the form of tincture as an aromatic stimulant and carminative, often given with purgative medicines to prevent griping.

card'-board, s. [Eng. card, and board.] Pasteboard paper stiffened by several layers being joined together. Bristol board is all white paper, and is made of two or more sheets according to the thickness required. Other qualities are made by inclosing common thick paper between sheets of white or coloured papers of the required quality.

-rdboard-press, s. A press having a pair of rolls adapted to be closed together with great force, and used to smooth and polish sheets of card passed therethrough.

card'-ĕd, pa. par. & a. [Card (2), v.]

* card'-ĕr (1), s. [Card (1), v.] One who is addicted to card-playing, a gambler.

"[. . .] cappers, carders, dicers, setters of lands, and bank-route, leaves out of that lake and filthy puddell."—Weston: Christian Manual, sign. I. vi., 1576.

card'-ĕr (2), s. & s. [Card (2), v.]

A. As subst.: One who, or an instrument which, cards wool.

"The clothiers all have put off
The spinsters, carders, fullers, weavers."
Shakesp.: Henry VIII., i. 2.

B. As adj.: (See the subjoined compound).

carder-bee, s. A social bee, Bombus muscorum, found wild in West Europe. It is yellow in colour. It cards or teases out the moss or other material to be used in making its nest comfortable. A file of carder-bees stand out in a line from their nest; the first takes a piece of moss, teases it with its fore-legs, then pushing it under the body to the next bee. This second one picks it up and repeats the process. So does the next and the next, till the last of the file pushes the carded moss under its body into the nest. The bee is one of the common British species. One who removes its nest to a box among flowers outside his window, and strews moss loosely about, can see the whole carding process carried out before his eyes.

car-di-ę, s. [Gr καρδία (kardía) = the heart.]

car-di-nal, * car-den alle, *car-dy-nale, a. & s. [Fr. cardinal; Lat. cardinalis, from cardo = a hinge. A letter, probably to have been penned by Pope Anacletus in the first century, but in reality to go no further than the ninth, says:—"Apostolica sedes cardo totius omnium Ecclesiarum a Domino est constituta, et sicut cardine ostium regitur, sic hujus Sedis auctoritate omnes Ecclesiæ [illegible]" = "The Apostolic chair has been constituted by the Lord the hinge and head of all the Churches; and as a door is controlled by its hinge, so all Churches are governed by the Holy Chair." Pope Leo IX. points out the relation in which the word cardinal stands to the idea of a hinge:—"Clerici summæ S[illegible] Cardinales dicuntur, [illegible] cæteris moventur vicinum obtemperantes."—"The clerics of the supreme chair are called carditain, as undoubtedly adhering more nearly to that hinge by which all things are moved."—Trench: On the Study of Words, 2nd edit., pp. 76, 77 n.]

A. As adjective:

1. That on which a thing or matter revolves or depends; most important, chief, principal.

2. Of a deep red colour, less vivid than scarlet. (Used also substantively.)

"... holy men I thought ye,
Upon my soul, two reverend cardinal virtues;
But cardinal sins and hollow hearts, I fear ye."
Shakesp. Henry VIII., iii. 1.

B. As substantive:

1. Church Hist.: The highest dignitary in the Roman Catholic Church under the Pope. They are seventy in number, in allusion to the seventy disciples sent out by our Lord, and have the right of electing the Pope. They include six cardinal bishops, fifty cardinal priests, and fourteen cardinal deacons, who constitute the sacred college, and are chosen by the Pope. The dress of a cardinal is a red cassock, a rochet, a short purple mantle, and a red hat, to show that they should be ready to shed their blood for the Holy See. Before the reign of Nicolas II. in the eleventh century, the Roman pontiffs were elected by the whole clergy of the city of Rome, and by the prominent laity—nay, even by the body of the citizens. This pontiff transferred the election primarily to the cardinals, the other parties signifying their assent, and, finally, Alexander III., in the Third Lateran Council (A.D. 1179), limited the election to the cardinals, two thirds of whom must vote for the person elected. This is the method of election which still prevails.

A CARDINAL.

"His reved of his suit ful sare
And hauld for his sin alle bare."
Metrical Homilies, p. 18.

2. Solicitude, anxiety, concern.

"I can be calm and free from care
On any shore, since God is there."
Cowper: The Soul that Loves God.

3. Caution, heed (especially in the phrases, to have a care, to take care).

"My lady prays you to have a care of him."—Shakesp: Twelfth Night, iii. 4.

"King Olaf, have a care!"—Carlyle: Heroes and Hero-worship, lect. 1.

4. Regard, charge, solicitude for, oversight

"If we believe that there is a God, that takes care of us. . . ."—Tillotson.

". . . us, and our affairs,
Are part of a Jehovah's care."
Cowper: A Poetical Epistle to Lady Austen.

5. The object of one's regard or solicitude.

"Flushed were his cheeks, and glowing were his eyes:
Is she thy care? is she thy care? he cries."
Dryden: Virgil: Æn. x. 38.

"Our fathers live (our first most tender care), Thy good Menœtius bathes the vital air."
Pope: Homer's Iliad xvi. 18.

6. It is vaguely used in the sense of inclination or desire.

¶ (1) Crabb thus distinguishes between care, solicitude, and anxiety: "These terms express mental pain in different degrees; care less than solicitude, and less than anxiety. Care consists of thought and feeling; solicitude and anxiety of feeling only. Care respects the past, present, and future: solicitude and anxiety regard the present and future. Care is directed towards the present and absent, near or at a distance; solicitude and anxiety are employed about that which is absent and at a certain distance. We are careful about the means; solicitous and anxious about the end, we are solicitous to obtain a good, we are anxious to avoid an evil. The cares of a parent exceed every other in their weight. He has an unceasing solicitude for the welfare of his children, and experiences many an anxious thought lest all his care should be lost upon them."

(2) He thus discriminates between care, concern, and regard:—"Care and concern consist both of thought and feeling, but the latter has less of thought than feeling; regard consists of thought only. We care for a thing which is the object of our emotions; we concern ourselves about a thing when it engages our attention, we have regard for a thing on which we set some value and bestow some reflection. Care is altogether an active principle; the careful man leaves no means untried in the pursuit of his object, care actuates him to personal endeavours, it is opposed to negligence. Concern is not so active in its nature; the person who concerns himself will be contented to see exertions made by others; it is opposed to indifference. Regard is only a sentiment of the mind; it may lead to action, but of itself extends no further than reflection. The business of life is the subject of care; religion is the grand object of concern; the esteem of others is an object of regard."

(3) In his view the following is the difference between care, charge, and management:—"Care will include both charge and management; but, in the strict sense, it comprehends personal labour; charge involves responsibility; management includes regulation and order. . . . Care is employed in menial occupations, charge in matters of trust and confidence; management in matters of business and experience. The servant has care of the cattle: an instructor has the charge of youth; a clerk has the management of a business." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(4) For the distinction between care and heed, see Heed.

Among the woods and hills."
Wordsworth: Poet and the Broom.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between careful, cautious, and provident:—"We are careful to avoid mistakes, cautious to avoid danger, provident to avoid straits and difficulties. Care is exercised in saving and retaining what we have; caution must be used in guarding against the evils that may be; providence must be employed in supplying the good or guarding against the contingent evils of the future. Care consists in the use of means, in the exercise of the faculties for the attainment of an end; a careful person omits nothing. Caution consists rather in abstaining from action; a cautious person will not act where he ought not. Providence respects the use of things, it is both care and caution in the management of property; a provident person acts for the future by abstaining for the present." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(2) Careful and attentive are thus distinguished:—"These epithets denote a fixedness of mind; we are attentive in order to understand and improve; we are careful to avoid mistakes. An attentive scholar profits by what is told him in learning his task; a careful scholar performs his exercises correctly. Attentive respects matters of judgment; careful relates to mechanical action; we listen attentively; we read or write carefully."

care fŭl-ly, ' care-ful-liche, ' car-ful-li, adv. [Eng. careful; -ly.]

"Your return, ah why these long delays?
Your happier sons, while careless Peace reigns . . ."
Pope: Iliad, i. 1004.

"Dryden . . . enjoyed for the golden days of the careless and good-natured Charles."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. viii.

¶ With of or about before the object neglected or disregarded.

"He is bold
In silly delays on crushed things.
Duchess of Malfi Cruelty.

Conquest Past. v. 197.

"A woman, the more curious she is about her face is commonly the more careless about her house."—Ben Jonson.

2. Of things:

(1) Cheerful, undisturbed.

"In my cheerful morn of life,
When nurs'd by careless solitude I liv'd."
Thomson.

"To me myself, for some three careless summer.
The summer pilot of an empty heart."
Tennyson: The Gardener's Daughter.

(2) Done or uttered thoughtlessly, or without care.

"The freedom of saying so many careless things as other people without being so severely remarked upon."—Pope.

*(3) Not according to art; rude.

"He framed the careless rhyme."—Beattie.

"This arises . . . exclusion and carency of Divine favour for the time. It was the Father's pleasure to have it so."—Bp. Richardson: On the Old Testament, 1655, p. 185.

* car en e (1), s. [Low Lat. carena.] [Quarantine.] A fast of forty days on bread and water.

? ca-rēne (2), s. [Lat. carenum, from Gr. καρηνον (karenon), καρουν (karoun).] A sweet wine boiled down.

* căr -ĕn -tāne, s. [Quarantine.] A papal indulgence, multiplying the remission of penance by forties.

"In the church of St. Vitus and Modestus, there are, for every day in the year, seven thousand years, and seven thousand carentanes of pardon."—Bp. Taylor: Dissuasive against Popery.

ca-rēss, v.t. [Caress, s. In Fr. caresser; Ital. carezzare.]

1. Lit.: To fondle, embrace, treat with kindness and affection.

2. Fig. To court, flatter.

"They whom the world caresses most Have no such privilege to boast

"All political parties esteemed and caressed him."
Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. viii.

Crabb thus distinguishes between caress and fondle:—"Both these terms mark a species of endearment. . . . We caress by words or actions; we fondle by actions only." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

ca-rēss, s. [Fr. caresse = a cheering, cherishing; caresser = to cherish, hug, make much of (Cotgrave); Ital. carezza; Low Lat. caritia = dearness, value; carus = dear, valuable. Cf. Ir. cara = a friend; caraim = to love.]

1. Lit.: An embrace, a fondling, an act of affection and endearment.

"He, she knew, would intermix Grateful digressions, and solve high dispute
With conjugal caresses."
Milton: Par. Lost, viii. 56.

"The common people crowded to gaze on him wherever he moved, and almost stifled him with rough caresses."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

2. Fig.: Flattery, courting.

"... he practised it more to win by indulgence and caress the hearts of all one could under his command."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xviii.

ca-rēss -ing-ly, adv. [Eng. caressing; -ly.] In a caressing or fond manner; fondly, lovingly.

"It was evidently a case of love at first sight. I saw she was about to ... caressingly."
Percival Dunwood, Miss Mafit, p. 8, ch. xiv., vol. ii., p. 118.

car -ĕt, s. [Lat. caret; 3rd pers. sing. pres. indic. of careo = to be wanting, or lacking.] A mark (^) used to show that some words omitted in the line, and inserted in the margin or above the line, should be read in that place.

car ex (pl. car-i-çēs, used in speaking of individuals of the genus), s. [Lat. carex = a sedge, a rush.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, of the natural order Cyperaceæ (Sedges). It is more numerous in British species than any other genus, nearly seventy figuring in the flora of Great Britain. There are also numerous foreign species in cold, damp climates, the genus Cyperus taking the place of Carex in the tropics. Carices are inauritious to cattle. Carex arenaria binds together the sand of the seashore. Its rootstock, with those of C. disticha and C. hirta, is used under the name of German sarsaparilla in skin diseases and in secondary syphilis, being reputed to be diaphoretic and diuretic. The Laplanders protect their hands and feet against frost-bites by placing the leaves of C. aylvatica in their gloves and shoes. The leaves of some species are used for tying the hops to the poles in English hop-grounds, and in Italy they are placed between the staves of wine casks, are woven over Florence flasks, and sometimes used for making chair bottoms.

car -ey a, s. [Named after Dr. W. Carey, of Serampore, an Indian botanist and missionary.]

Bot.: A genus of plants belonging to the order Barringtoniaceæ or Barringtoniads. The species are trees from India and Australia. They have large stalked, serrate, and obovate leaves, large red or greenish-yellow flowers, in spikes or corymbs. Careya arborea has an eatable fruit, of which, however, the seeds are suspicious. Its bark is made into rough cordage or into slow-matches for firelocks. Its wood, which may be polished like mahogany, is made into boxes, &c. The bark of C. sphærica, a Malay species, is also used for cordage.

* carf, ' carfe, v.t. [Carve, v.]

"Carf him of fet and hande."—Robert of Gloucester, p. 56.

car -fax, ' car-fowgh, ' car-feukes, s. [O. Fr. carrefur, carrefourg, quarrefour, from Lat. quadrifurcus = having four forks or spurs. The first form still survives as a place-name in the city of Oxford.]

ca-rí'-a-cus, s. [Latinized from cariacou (q.v.).]

Zool.: An American genus of Cervidæ, of which the mule-deer (q.v.) is the type.

 car'-iage, s. [CARRIAGE.]

çar-I-a'-ma, car-I-a'-ma, s. [Port., from the Brazilian Seriema or Ceriema.]

Ornith.: A bird, a native of Brazil and Paraguay, the Palamedea cristata of Gmelin, Dicholophus cristatus of Illiger, and Cariama cristata of some other ornithologists. It is of most retired habits. It is doubtful to what family it belongs, resembling, as it does in various points, the Grallatores, the Struthionidæ, and the Gallinaceæ. The head is crested.

 car-I-are, * car-y-are, s. [CARRIER.]

 cár'-I-ă-tĕd, a. [Lat caries = a decay or ulceration of a tooth.] Affected with caries; carious.

cár-I-át'-id-ęs, s. pl. [CARYATIDES.]

Cár-ib, s. [Sp. carib = a cruel, barbarous man. Probably a corruption of carina, callina, and callinago, the native name of the race described below.]

Ethnol.: An American-Indian race formerly inhabiting part of the West Indies, but now nearly extinct.

Cár-I-bæ'-an, Cár-ib-bē'-an, a. [From Sp. carib, and Eng., &c., suff. -æan.] Pertaining to the Caribs or the region which they inhabited.

¶ Caribæan bark: The bark of a plant, Exostemma floribundum, one of the Cinchonaceæ. (Treas. of Bot.) It is also known as Piton bark.

cár'-I-bôo, cár'-I-bóu, s. [N. Amer. Ind.]

Zool.: Rangifer caribou, the wild variety of the Reindeer (q.v.). It has never been domesticated, but is hunted for its venison.

"The caribou deer of America, who have to contend still more with deep snow than the reindeer of the old continent, have their horns broader and better adapted to the purpose, besides, both varieties, in addition to these natural shovels, have broad feet, not only to sustain them better on the snow, but also to clear it away."—Swainson: Natural History of Quadrupeds, p. 228.

cár'-I-eę, s. [From Caria, a district of Asia Minor, whence it was supposed to have come.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, the typical one of the order of Papayads (Papayaceæ). It contains about ten species, all natives of tropical America. They are small trees without branches, and with large, variously-lobed leaves, resembling those of some kinds of palm. They exude an acrid, milky juice when wounded. The most remarkable species is the Carica Papaya, the Papaw-tree, a small tree, seldom above twenty feet high, with a stem about a foot in diameter, tapering gradually to the top, where it is about four or five inches. The fruit is of a dingy orange-yellow colour, oblong, about ten inches long by three or four broad. The juice of this tree is believed in the West Indies to have the remarkable property of rendering the toughest meat tender, and even the flesh of pigs or poultry fed on the fruit or leaves is certain to be tender. The ripe fruit is made into sauce or preserved in sugar, and the juice of the unripe fruit is used to remove freckles. The leaves are employed as a substitute for soap. C. digitata, a tree which grows in Brazil, where it is called chamburu, is regarded almost with superstitious awe as a deadly poison.

cár'-I-eę-türe, * cár-I-eę-tür'-ę, s. [Ital. caricatura = a satirical picture, one overloaded with exaggeration; from caricare = to load; Low Lat. carrico = to load; carrus = a car.]

1. A drawing or picture of a person in which certain points are so exaggerated as to give a ludicrous effect to the whole.

"From all these hands we have such draughts of mankind as are represented in those burlesque pictures which the Italians call caricaturas; where the art consists in preserving, amidst distorted proportions and aggravated features, some distinguishing likeness of the person; but in such a manner as to transform the most agreeable beauty into the most odious monster."—Spectator, No. 537.

". . . a hideous caricature of the most graceful and majestic of princes, was dragged about Westminster in a chariot."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

* 2. A parody of a book.

car'-mĕl-ite, s. [In Fr. carmélite = a nun; carme = a monk, named from Mount Carmel in the Holy Land, where they were established in the twelfth century; suffix -ite.]

Carmelite.

1. Eccles. Hist.: An order of mendicant friars, who wear a scapulary, or small woollen habit of a brown colour, thrown over the shoulders. They claim to be in direct succession from Elijah, but their real founder was Berthold, a Calabrian, who, with a few companions, migrated to Mount Carmel about the middle of the twelfth century, and built a humble cottage with a chapel, where he and his associates led a laborious and solitary life. In 1209, Albert, patriarch of Jerusalem, gave the solitaries a rigid rule, containing sixteen articles, and enjoining the most severe discipline. After their establishment in Europe, their rule was in some respects altered, the first time by Pope Innocent IV., and afterwards by Eugenius IV. and Pius II. The order is divided into two branches, viz., the Carmelites of the ancient observance, called the moderate or mitigated; and those of the strict observance, who are known as the barefooted Carmelites. Some of the Carmelites came to England about 1240, and the order ultimately had about forty houses in this country. It is sometimes called the Order of St. Mary of Mount Carmel.

Peter Heylin: Cosmography, bk. i.

"Soon a multitude of dogs came to feast on the carnage."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvii.

◆ Crabb thus distinguishes between carnage, slaughter, massacre, and butchery: "Carnage respects the number of dead bodies that may be said either of men or animals; but more commonly of the former. Slaughter respects the act of taking away life and the circumstances of the agent; massacre and butchery respect the circumstances of the subjects who are the sufferers; to which the latter three are confined. Beasts only Carnage is the consequence of an injudicious attack from a powerful foe: soldiers who get into a besieged town are a wolf who breaks into a sheepfold, commonly make a dreadful carnage; slaughter is the sole purpose of war-fire. . . . A massacre is the consequence of secret and personal resentment between bodies of people . . . . Butchery is the general accompaniment of a massacre; defenceless women and children are commonly butchered by the savage furies who are most active in this work of blood." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

B. As adj.: Pertaining to slaughter or [redacted]

"Not seared not yet, the hall within,
The shriek, the shout, the carnage-din. . . ."

car-niv'-ŏr-a, s. pl. [Lat. carnivorus, neut. pl. of carnivorus = flesh-devouring; caro (genit. carnis) = flesh; voro = to devour.]

Zool.: A principal division of the Mammalia. The name is given to those animals which, like the feline, canine, and ursine families, have their teeth peculiarly fitted for the mastication of animal matter. The incisors, except in some seals, are generally $\frac{3-3}{3-3}$ the canines generally $\frac{1-1}{1-1}$. They are, moreover, larger and longer than the incisors. The clavicles are rudimentary, or wanting. They are divided into two great groups, or sub-orders, one terrestrial the other aquatic. The first is the group of the Fissipedia, or "split-feet," so called from the fact that their feet are divided into well-marked toes; the second is the group of Pinnipedia, or "fin-feet" (seals, &c.), so called because the toes are bound together by skin—forming fins or flappers rather than feet. Another classification is into three sections or tribes—(1) Pinnigrada, or Pinnipedia; examples, the Seals and Walruses. (2) Plantigrada; example, the Bear, and (3) Digitigrada; examples, the Cat and the Dog.

* 3. A song sung as an accompaniment to dancing.

"Alle the damesalles to synge carolles and to go againe hem synginge oute of the town."—Merlin, I. ii. 132.

4. A song of praise sung at Christmas-tide. It originally meant a song accompanied with dancing, in which sense it is frequently used by the old poets. It appears to have been danced by many performers, by taking hands, forming a ring, and singing as they went round. Bishop Taylor says that the oldest carol was that sung by the heavenly host when the birth of the Saviour was announced to the Shepherds on the plains of Bethlehem. It is probable that the practice of singing carols at Christmas-tide arose in imitation of this, as the majority of the carols declared the good tidings of great joy; and the title of Noels, nowells, or nowelles, applied to carols, would seem to bear out this idea. Carol singing is of great antiquity among Christian communities, as the carol by Aurelius Prudentius, of the fourth century, will show. (Stainer & Barrett.)

"Singers of carroles . . ."—Acts xv. Vulg., 1581, c. xvi.

"No night is now with hymn or carol blest."

"Werkis of carpentarye, of browdrye, and of werkyng with nedlis."—Wycliffe: Exodus, xxxv 33.

2. An assemblage of pieces of timber connected by framing or letting them into each other, as are the pieces of a roof, floor, centre, &c. It is distinguished from joinery by being put together without the use of any other edge tools than the axe, adze, saw, and chisel, whereas joinery requires the use of the plane. The leading points that require attention in sound carpentry are (1) the quality of the timber used; (2) the disposition of the pieces of timber, so that each may be in such direction with reference to the fibres of the wood, as to be capable of performing its work properly; (3) the forms and dimensions of the pieces; (4) the manner of framing the pieces into each other, or otherwise uniting them by means of iron or other metal. (Gwilt.)

"That' makes the workis of carpentarye, . . ."—Wycliffe: Exodus, xxxv 35.

"Private men's halls were hung with altar-cloths, their tables and beds covered with copes, instead of carpets and coverlets."—Fuller: The Church History of Britain, p. vii. § 2. 1. (French: Select Glossary, p. 29.)

¶ The use of rugs is of great antiquity in Egypt, India, China, and Babylon. In the East at present Persia, Asiatic Turkey, and India are great seats of carpet manufacture. Carpets were introduced into England during the Crusades, but long afterwards, indeed even to the time of Queen Elizabeth, the floors of palaces, not to speak of inferior habitations, were strewed with rushes. The practice of hanging the walls of palatial edifices with tapestry and cloth is older than that of carpeting the floors; thus in Hampton Court, built by Cardinal Wolsey, the floors are bare, while the walls are covered with tapestry. The manufacture of carpets was introduced into France from Persia about A.D. 1606, and workmen from France brought the art to England about 1750. A carpet manufactory was established at Axminster in 1755. The carpet industry has become an important one in the United States, particularly in Philadelphia.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Anything used for or serving as a carpet.

"It was in vain that Schomberg tried to teach them to improve their habitations, and to cover the wet earth with a thick carpet of fern."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

† (2) Manners, behaviour, deportment.

"Let them have ever so learned lectures of breeding, that which will most influence their carriage will be the company they converse with, and the fashion of those about them."—Locke.

† (3) Conduct, practices.

"Yesterday Mr Steele's affair was decided : I am sorry I can be of no other opinion than yours, as to his whole carriage and writings of late."—Pope : Letter to Congreve (1714-15.)

* (4) Management ; manner of carrying out or transacting business.

"The manner of carriage of the business was as if there had been secret inquisition upon him."—Bacon : Henry VII.

* (5) Meaning, intent.

"As, by the same covenant,
And carriage of the article design'd."
Shakesp. : Hamlet, I. 1

II. Technically :

1. Vehicles : In the senses I. 1 (3) and (4) Carriages of one kind or other have existed from immemorial antiquity. One of the earliest forms was a bullock carriage, of which some specimens of primitive type may yet be seen in India. The simplest is a short plank of wood, which the passenger bestrides, holding on by two upright handles, and inserting his toes between the wheels and the body of the vehicle. The practice of lengthening wagons was known to the Romans, and is not a modern discovery, made by the South African Dutch Boers. Horne considers that the making of coaches in England commenced in A.D. 1555. Stage-wagons were introduced into England in 1564, and coaches plied for hire in London in 1625. Up till about 1750 the roads in that country were so bad that they were suitable only for hack and pack horses, but having been improved early in the eighteenth century, stage-coaches commenced to run about 1750, and from 1784 were allowed to carry the mails. In the United States road improvement is advancing, and the use of handsome carriages is steadily increasing. [Car, Cart, Coach.]

¶ Horseless carriage : Vehicles of various types, propelled by small steam engines or electricity, are now being introduced in this country and abroad, with much promise of practical utility for business purposes and pleasure jaunting.

2. Military :

(1) The frame on which a gun is mounted and carried. [Gun-carriage.]

"He commanded the great ordnance to be laid upon carriages. . . ."—Knolles : History of the Turks.

* (2) A sword-belt.

"The carriages, sir, are the hangers."—Shakesp. ; Hamlet, v. 2.

3. Carp. : The timber framework on which the steps of a wooden staircase are supported.

† 4. Drainage : A channel cut for the conveyance of water to overflow or irrigate ground ; a carrier.

5. Printing :

(1) The frame on rollers by which the bed, carrying the forme, with the tympan and frisket, is run in and out from under the platen.

(2) The frame which carries the inking-rollers.

6. Mach. : A portion of a machine which moves and carries an object ; as—

(1) The log-carriage of a sawing-machine.

(2) The bit-carriage of a boring-machine, which carries the bit and is advanced to the work.

(3) The carriage of a mule-spinner, which travels towards and from the creel on which the bobbins are skewered.

(4) Of a horizontal shaft : The bearings in which it turns.

¶ (1) Crabb thus distinguishes between carriage, gait, and walk : Carriage is here the most general term ; it respects the manner of carrying the body, whether in a state of motion or rest ; gait is the mode of carrying the limbs and body wherever we move ; walk is the manner of carrying the body when we move forward to walk. A person's carriage is somewhat natural to him ; it is often an indication of character, but admits of great change by education ; we may always distinguish a man as high or low, either in point of station, by his carriage ; gait is artificial : we may contract a certain gait by habit ; the word is therefore often taken for a bad habit of going, as when a person has a limping gait, or an unsteady gait ; walk is less definite than either, as it is applicable to the ordinary movements of men ; there is a good, a bad, or indifferent walk ; but it is not a matter of the differences which of these kinds of walk we have : it is the great art of the dancing-master to give a good walk.

(2) For the difference between carriage and behaviour, see Behaviour.

B. As adj. : (See the compounds).

Compounds of obvious signification (as carriage-builder, carriage-horse, carriage house.

carriage-bolt, s. A screw bolt, with a chamfered head, square neck, and threaded shank, for use in carriage-building.

carriage-brake, s. A retarding apparatus, to reduce the speed of a carriage in descending a hill. [Brake.]

carriage-bridge, s.

Milit. : A roller bridge to be moved upon glacis, and form a bridge from counterscarp to scarp, for the passage of the attacking column.

1. The coupling of a carriage unites the fore and hind carriages. It is called the perch or reach in carriages that possess it, but in many modern carriages is dispensed with, the bed resting on the fore and hind carriages, forming the only coupling. In wagons, the coupling is a pole, whose forward end is held to the king-bolt in the fore-carriage ; the hind end passes through an opening between the hind axle and bolster, and the bounds of the hind axle are fastened to the pole by a pin.

2. A means of uniting the bed to the fore-carriage. It usually consists of a king-bolt, which forms the pintle on which the fore-carriage turns, and the fifth wheel, which is bolted to keep the portions from bouncing apart. (Knight.) carriage-guard, s. A plate on the bed of a carriage where the fore wheel runs in turning short.

carriage-jack, s. A lever-jack, designed to raise the axle so as to lift the carriage from the ground for the purpose of removing the wheel from the spindle for repair or greasing. [Jack.]

carriage-lock, s. A fastening for a carriage-wheel, to restrain its rotation or to prevent its freedom of movement in descending a hill.

carriage-lubricator, s. A self-acting appliance for lubricating a carriage wheel box and spindle without removing the wheel from the axle.

Carp. : One of the slanting pieces on which the steps of a wooden staircase are laid ; a rough-string. The upper end rests against the apron-piece or pitching-piece, which is secured to the joists of the landing.

carriage-shackle, s. The bar which connects the axle-slip to the thill or shaft. (Knight.) carriage-spring, s. An elastic device interposed between the bed of a carriage and its running-gears, to lessen the jar incident to inequalities in the road, and the saltatory and rolling motion of the bed itself. (Knight.) carriage-step, s. A step, usually on a jointed dependent frame, to afford means for mounting into a carriage.

1. The cover of a carriage. Permanent in coaches ; double calash in barouches and landaus ; calash in some gigs, buggies, phaetons, &c. ; curtained in ambulances and spring-wagons.

2. A shifting-rail on the back and ends of a buggy-seat, to make a high-back, or, by removal, a low-back buggy.

carriage-wheel, s. The wheel of a carriage. This has usually a hub or nave, spokes, fellies, and tire. A box fitted in the hub is in contact with the spindle or arm of the axle, and the wheel is held on the spindle by a linch-pin, nut, or other device

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Gen.: One who or that which carries anything.

"You must distinguish between the motion of the air, which is but a reluctum causa, a carrier of the sounds, and the sounds conveyed."—Bacon: Nat. Hist.

2. Specially:

(1) One whose trade or occupation it is to carry or convey goods.

"the path was sometimes blocked up during a long time by carriers neither of whom would break the way."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iii.

(2) One who carries a message, a messenger.

"The welcome news is in the letter found:
The carrier is not commissioned to expound:
It speaks itself."—Dryden: Religio Laici, 367.

II. Technically:

1. Law: A carrier in law is one who undertakes for hire or reward to transport the goods of such as employ him from place to place. Two sorts of these exist, carriers by land and carriers by water. Under the former category are ranked the proprietors of stage-coaches, railway companies, waggoners, parcels' delivery companies, &c. Common carriers are generally held liable by law for losses, except those come by act of God (storms, floods, &c.), or are caused by enemies of the United States, or the owner of the property itself. Notice of non-liability is sometimes given by carriers, but does not hold good in law.

2. Elect.: A proof plane, used to transmit small charges of electricity. It consists of a small piece of gilt paper, with a non-conducting handle.

3. Mechanics:

"The Cartesian philosophy begins now to be almost universally rejected. . . ."—A. Smith: Hist of Astronomy.

B. As subst.: One who adopts the philosophical tenets of Descartes cartesian-devil, s. A contrivance to illustrate the effect of the compression or expansion of air in changing the specific gravity of bodies. It is a small glass figure, hollow, and sometimes provided with a hollow bulb on its head. This is to be partly filled with water, and placed in a tall vessel, nearly full of water, and having a piece of membrane secured tightly over the top. On pressing the membrane the air of the vessel will be compressed; this will compress that within the figure or bulb, so admitting more water by a small aperture, and causing the figure to sink. On removing the pressure the air in the figure or bulb will expand, forcing out some of the water, and causing it to rise. (Francis.) (Webster.) It is called also a cartesian-devil.

cartesian-diver, s. The same as CARTESIAN-DEVIL (q.v.).

car-tē-si-an-ism, s. [Eng. cartesian; -ism.] The system of philosophy taught by Descartes. René Descartes in his twentieth year resolved as far as possible to eliminate from his mind all that had ever been taught him by books or by instructors, and think out for himself the entire circle of knowledge. His first postulate was "Cogito, ergo sum"—"I think, therefore I exist." Inquiring next into ideas, which he defined as "all that is in our mind when we conceive a thing, in whatever way we conceive it," he regarded clearness and distinctness as the criterion of a true as distinguished from a false idea. Of all ideas in the human mind that of a God is the clearest, therefore there is a God. As in this clear conception of God infinite veracity is attributed to Him, it is impossible that he could make our faculties deceive us in mathematical and metaphysical demonstrations; these sciences, therefore, are trustworthy. The actual existence of the external world is proved by the prior truth, the existence of God. Creation was and is a manifestation of the Divine will.

Descartes revolutionised mathematics, imparting to it a beneficial impulse. He did so likewise to metaphysics. Among his immediate followers in the latter science were Geulincx, Malebranche, and Spinoza. A celebrated opponent was Gassendi. The method of Descartes was adopted by all the philosophers of the rationalistic school who flourished during the latter half of the seventeenth and the whole of the eighteenth centuries. In physics he discovered the law of the refraction of a ray of light through a diaphanous body, but his à priori method was not the proper instrument for physical investigation, and his researches in that department were a comparative failure. [VORTEX.]

cart-ful, * cart-fŭll, s. [Eng. cart, and full(l).] As much as a cart will hold; a quantity which will fill a cart.

"The bishop licensed certain victuals into the town, and . . . by entreaty of the Cardinal Gondi at twenty-five crowns . . . a cart-full, and a cow eight."—Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 414.

car-tha-mūs, s. [Mod. Lat., from Arab. qurtum, qirtim, from Heb. qarthamîl = bastard saffron.]

Bot.: A small genus of composite flowers, containing two annual species, of which one, the Safflower plant or Bastard Saffron (Carthamus tinctorius), is extensively cultivated in India, China, &c., as well as Southern Europe. Under the name of Safflower the flowers of this plant are extensively imported into this country, principally from India, for the sake of the two colouring matters, yellow and red contained in them, which are used for dyeing silk, &c. Mixed with finely powdered talc it forms the well-known substance known as rouge. It is also used to adulterate saffron. According to Col. Sykes the seeds of C. persicus produce a useful oil, eatable when fresh. The oil-cake formed from it is very nourishing to milch cattle. In times of scarcity the seeds themselves are eaten, while the leaves of the plant are used as greens. (Lindley, &c.)

"Carthamus, the flower of which alone is used, is an annual plant cultivated in Spain, Egypt, and the Levant. There are two varieties of it, one which has large leaves, and the other smaller ones. It is the last which is cultivated in Egypt, where it is a considerable article of commerce."—Ure's Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

căr´-ŷ-e, s. [Gr. κάρυα (karua), pl. of κάρυον (karuon) = a nut.]

Bot.: A genus of North American plants, allied to the Walnut, and belonging to the order Juglandaceæ. Carya alba is the common Hickory (q.v.). The seeds of C. amara, with oil of chamomile, are useful in colic.

căr-ŷ-ā´-tēz, căr-ŷ-ă´t-id-ēz, s.pl. [Lat. Caryates; Gr. καρυάτιδες (karuatides) = women of Carya. According to Vitruvius, from Carya, in Laconia, from whence, at its conquest by the Greeks, the women were led away captive, and, to perpetuate their slavery, were represented in buildings as charged with burdens.]

Arch.: Figures of females, used instead of columns for the support of an entablature. Male figures in this position and relation are called Atlantes, Telamones, or Persians.

căr-ŷ-ăt´-ic, a. [Lat. caryat(es); suffix -ic.] Of or pertaining to caryatides. (Pen. Cycl.)

căr-ŷ-ăt´-id, a. & s. [Gr. καρυάτιδες (karuatides).]

A. As adjective:

Arch.: Pertaining to or of the nature of a caryatid. (Pen. Cycl.)

B. As substantive:

Arch.: A single female figure sustaining an entablature.

ca-ryb´-dē-a, s. [Lat. Charybdis.]

Zool.: A genus of Medusæ, order Acephala, class Simplicia, in which no traces of vessels can be perceived internally.

* car-y-en, * car-yn, v.t. [CARRY.]

* car-yne, s. [CARRION.]

căr´-ŷ-ō-car, s. [Gr. κάρυον (karuon) = a nut.]

Bot.: One of two genera, forming the order Rhizobolaceæ (Rhizobols). There are about eight species, all hardwooded trees, and natives of the tropical regions of South America. The most interesting is Caryocar nuciferum, which produces the Souari, or Butter-nuts, occasionally met with in English fruit-shops. These nuts are shaped something like a kidney, having an exceedingly hard, woody shell, enclosing a large white kernel, which has a pleasant nutty taste, and yields a bland oil on pressure. The timber also is valuable for ship-building, mill-work, &c.

căr-ŷ-ō-cri-ni´-tēs, s. [Gr. κάρυον (karuon) = a nut; κρίνον (krinon) = a lily.]

Paleont.: A genus of Crinoidea, or Stone-lilies, found in the palæozoic limestones of North America.

căr-ŷ-ō-dăph´-nē, s. [Gr. κάρυον (karuon) = a nut; δάφνη (daphnē) = a laurel.]

Bot.: A genus of Javanese trees, belonging to the Laurel family. The bark of Caryodaphne densiflora is bitter in taste; its leaves are aromatic, and used in cases of spasms of the bowels.

căr ŷ-ŏl´-ō-phe, s. [Gr κάρυον (karuon) = a nut; λοφος (lophos) = a crest.]

Bot.: A section of Anchusa, a genus of Boraginaceæ, containing A. sempervirens, a plant with a salver-shaped corolla, with very short straight tube, and the ring at the base of the nuts prolonged on the inner side into an appendage. (Treas. of Bot.)

căr ŷ ō phŷl-lā´-ce-æ, s. pl. [Lat. caryophyll(us), a lapsed synonym of Dianthus (q.v.); fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.] The name refers to the clove-like smell of the pinks.

Bot.: A natural order of thalamiflora dicotyledons, classed by Lindley under his Silenal alliance. There are three sub-orders:—1. Silenæ, the Pink tribe, with united sepals opposite the stamens, where the latter are of the same number; 2. Alsinæ, the Chick-weed tribe, with separate sepals; 3. Molluginæ, the Carpet-weed tribe, in which the petals are wanting, and the stamens are alternate with the sepals when of the same number. They are all natives of cold and temperate regions. The Clove-pink (Dianthus Caryophyllus) is the origin of all the cultivated varieties of carnations, picotees, bizarres, flakes, &c. There are about sixty genera and 1,100 species.

căr-ŷ-ŏ-phŷl-lā´-çē-ŏŭs, a. [Lat. caryophyll(um); and Eng. adj. suff. -aceous.]

Bot.: Applied to a corolla whose petals have long distinct claws, as in the clove-pink.

căr-ŷ-ŏ-phŷl´-lē-æ, s. pl. [Lat. caryophyll(um), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -æ.]

Bot.: The same as CARYOPHYLLACEÆ (q.v.).

căr-ŷ-ŏ-phŷl lē-ŏŭs, a. [Caryophylle(æ); and Eng. adj. suff. -ous.]

Bot.: The same as CARYOPHYLLACEOUS (q.v.).

căr-ŷ-ŏ-phŷl´-li-e, s. [Lat. caryophyll(um); neut. pl. adj. suff. -ie.]

Zool. & Paleont.: A genus of Madrepore Polypi, in which the coral is branched, and the stars confined to the end of the branch. At each star is a mouth, surrounded by numerous tentacula. Caryophyllia cæspitosa is a common Mediterranean coral, and at Galieri, near Vizzini, in Sicily, a bed a foot and a half thick of the same species occurs fossil in Newer Pliocene deposits. The genus ranges from the Chalk to modern times.

căr-ŷ-ŏ-phŷl´-lic, a. [Lat. caryophyll(um); and Eng. suff. -ic (Chem.).]

caryophyllic acid, s.

Chem.: An acid obtained from the oil of cloves by means of alcohol. It is composed of twenty atoms of carbon, twelve of hydrogen, and four of oxygen.

căr-ŷ-ŏ-phŷl´-line, s. [Lat. caryophyll(um) and Eng. suff. -ine (Chem.).]

Chem.: $C_{10}H_{12}O$. A crystalline substance obtained from cloves by means of alcohol.

căr-ŷ-ŏ-phŷl´-lōid, a. [Fr. caryophyllide Gr καρυοφυλλον (karuophullon), and εἶδος (eidos) = form, appearance.]

Bot.: Resembling the Caryophyllæ, or Cloves.

căr-ŷ-ŏ-phŷl´-lūs, s. [Gr. καρυον (karuon) = a nut; φυλλον (phullon) = a leaf.]

1. Bot.: A genus of Myrtaceæ, containing Caryophyllus aromaticus, the tree producing the well-known spice called cloves. It is a handsome evergreen, rising from 15 to twenty feet high. [CLOVE.] It grows in the East Indian Islands. The trees are now extensively cultivated in the West Indies and elsewhere. All parts of the plant are aromatic from the presence of a volatile oil.

2. Pharm.: Cloves, the unexpanded flower-bud, dried, of Caryophyllus aromaticus, or Clove-tree. The clove has a stem-supporting nail-like, reddish-brown body, consisting of four-toothed calyx, and the unopened corolla.

☞ Caryophylli oleum, oil of cloves, the essential oil distilled from cloves. It is of a pale yellow colour when fresh, gradually becoming brown-red; sp. gr., 1·055. It consists of a hydrocarbon $C_{10}H_{16}$, containing a solution eugenic acid $C_{10}H_{12}O_2$, and a crystalline body caryophyllene (q.v.). Cloves contain tannin. Cloves and the oil are stimulant, aromatic, and carminative, and are employed in atonic dyspepsia, to allay vomiting in pregnancy, and to relieve flatulence; also the oil is used to allay the pain of carious teeth.

căr-ŷ-ŏp´-sis, s. [Gr. κάρυον (karuon) = a nut; ὄψις (opsis) = appearance.]

Bot.: A name applied to dry fruit consisting of a single seed, which is united by all parts of the thin pericarp. This fruit has the aspect of a seed; such is the fruit (commonly called seed) in the family of grasses. (Brande.)

căr ŷ-ō-tē, s. [Gr. καρυωτος φοινιξ (karuotos phoinix) = the date-palm; καρυον (karuon) = a nut.]

Bot.: A genus of very elegant, lofty palms with graceful twice pinnate leaves. Seven species are known, all natives of India and the Indian Islands. They have flowers of both sexes borne upon the same spadix at different times on different spikes. From the flowering spikes of C. urens a large quantity of sap, called toddy or palm-wine is obtained, which on boiling yields excellent palm sugar or palm-candy. The sago of commerce is got from the central or pithy part of the trunk. The fibre of the leaf-stalks is used for making ropes, brooms, mats, &c., and a wax is obtained by scraped off the leaf-stalk for making tapers.

* cas, s. [CASE.]

cā sā, phr. [An abbreviation of Cayus satisfaciendum.] [CAPIAS.]

cascarilla bark (Eng.), cascarilla cortex (Lat.), s.

Pharm.: The bark of Croton Eleuteria, or Eleuteria, a tree belonging to the order Euphorbiaceæ. It is a native of the Bahama Islands, being most abundant in Eleuthera, one of that group. The bark occurs in the market as small quilled pieces, about the size of a pencil, fissured in both directions, of a dull, brown colour, spotted white with lichens. It has a spicy smell and a bitter and aromatic taste. It contains a crystalline substance, Cascarilline. It is highly esteemed as an aromatic bitter tonic without astringency in cases of indigestion; also as a stimulant expectorant in chronic bronchitis. When burnt it emits a fragrant smell, on which account it has often at times mixed with tobacco.

"Cascarilla bark is imported chiefly from Eleuthera, one of the Bahama islands, packed in chests and bales."—Thomson: London Dispensatory, Croton.

cas-ca-ril line, s. [From Sp., &c., cascarilla, and Eng., &c., suff. -ine (Chem.) (q.v.).]

Chem.: A crystalline substance found in Cascarilla (q.v.).

Acts James III. (an. 1469; ed. 1814), p. 96. (Of caise, ed. 1566.)

4. * On or upon case, * on cas: By chance.

5. To put a case, * putte cuas: To suppose or propose an hypothetical instance or illustration of any case.

"I putte cuas that he ha space Forth to procede day by day." Lydgate.
"What profits it to put An idle case." Tennyson: In Mem. xxxv. 13.

6. To set case, * settè cus: The same as to put cuse.

"I sette cus that a theefe make an hole in a hous, for to take out good."—Gesta Romanorum (ed. Herrtage), p. 10.

¶ (1) Crabb thus distinguishes between a cuse and a cause: "The cuse is matter of fact; the cause is matter of question: a cuse involves circumstances and consequences; a cause involves reasons and arguments: a cuse is something to be learned; a cause is something to be decided. A cuse needs only to be stated; a cause must be defended; a cause may include cases, but not vice-versâ."

(2) For the distinction between cuse (2) and situation, see SITUATION.

B. As adjective: (See the compounds).

căs'-sĭ-ą, s. & a. [Lat. cassia; Gr. κασσία (kassia) and κασία (kasia); Ital. cassia; Fr. casse. For Heb. &c., see 1 Scripture.]

A. As substantive:

1. Script., &c.: Cassia occurs in the following places: (1) Exod. xxx. 24, where the Heb is קְדָה (qiddah), Sept. Gr. ἴρεως (irεōs), genit. of ἶρις (iris); (2) Psalm xlv. 8 (Heb. 9), where it is מְקִצִעֹת (qetsioth), which is the fem. pl. of קְצִיעָה (qetsiah), from קָצַע (qatsa) = to cut off, to peel off, used of bark, Sept. Gr. κασσία (kassia); and (3) Ezek. xxvii. 19, where it is קִדָּה (qiddah) (see No. 1). In the Septuagint there is a different reading. Qiddah is from קָדַד (qadad) = to cleave. According to Dr. Royle qiddah was probably what is now called Cassia-bark (q.v.), and the qetsiah the same as Syriac kooshta, Arab. koosh and koost, the Auclandia Costus, a composite plant growing near Cashmere, and allied to the Carline thistle.

"All thy garments smell of myrrh, aloes, and cassia."—Ps. xlv. 8.

cās-tan-ō-spēr'mŭm, s. [Gr. κάστανον (kastanon) = a chestnut; σπέρμα (sperma) = a seed.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, so named from the fancied resemblance of the seeds to the edible chestnuts of Europe. It comprises only one species, and belongs to the papilionaceous section of leguminous plants. It is found at Moreton Bay, in Queensland, Australia, where it grows to a height of from forty to fifty feet. The pea-like flowers are produced in racemes, and are of a bright yellow colour. The fruit is a pendulous cylindrical pod, six or eight inches in length, and tapering to both ends. It generally contains four seeds, rather larger than chestnuts, which are roasted and eaten, but are far inferior to the European chestnut, and have an astringent taste.

caste, s. [Fr. caste; Sp. & Port casta = a race, lineage, from Lat. castus = pure, chaste.]

1. Literally: An hereditary class of society in India: the members of which are theoretically equal in rank, and, as a rule, follow the same profession or occupation. Formerly it was customary to add "and in Egypt;" but the late Dr. Birch (1813-85), a distinguished Egyptologist, said that the Egyptians, strictly speaking, had not castes, though the son often succeeded to the office of the father. Caste must therefore be viewed in connection with India alone. There it sprang primarily from the distinction of ethnological race and from conquest.

The aborigines of India seem to have been Turanians. In pre-historic times a second influx of Turanians appears to have taken place, the new comers conquering the old inhabitants or driving them to the hills and jungles. Thus were produced two classes, what may be called Turanian caste people and Turanian outcasts. Next, but still at a remote period of antiquity, say 1700 B.C., or even earlier, an Aryan people from central Asia invaded the land, and after a struggle, continued for many centuries, became dominant nearly everywhere. Long before this conquest was effected, three occupations among them had hardened into castes the Brahmans or Priests, the Kshetriyas or Warriors, and the Vaisyas or Merchants. It is worthy of note that in our own time there go out in numbers from England the representatives of these three castes, and of these only—Brahmans (chaplains and missionaries), Kshetriyas (officers and soldiers), and Vaisyas (merchants). Artizans and labourers cannot afford to go, and the fourth Hindoo caste, that of the Sudras, or Artisans and Labourers, was constituted mainly of the Turanian caste-people, while the Pariahs and other outcasts and the wild tribes of the hills and the jungles are the older Turanian aborigines. When the real origin of the four leading castes and the outcasts beyond the pale had been forgotten, the Brahmans attempted to base the structure of society on what was alleged to be divine revelation. It was gravely asserted that the Brahmans came out of the mouth of the Supreme God to instruct men, the Kshetriyas from his arms to defend them, the Vaisyas from his stomach to feed them, and the Sudras from his feet to serve them.

Boudhism did its best to destroy caste, but after a struggle of about 1,250 years (say from 500 B.C. to 750 A.D.), during 1,000 years of which (from B.C. 250 to A.D. 750) it was victorious, it had to quit the field. (BOUDDHISM.) For the next 300 years caste was dominant and tyrannical in a high degree. Then the Muselman conquest began to break its power. Now Anglo-Indian influences, political, religious, and social, are sapping its authority, especially at the Presidency seats. It was an unintentional interference with caste law which produced the Sepoy mutinies and war of 1857 and 1858, though the Mohammedans joined in the outbreak from other motives.

Through the long ages during which Indian caste has existed, the original four castes have split into an immense multitude, and at present in almost any locality from 100 to 300 may be met with. Different castes refuse to eat together or to intermarry, and as a rule they follow hereditary occupations, but nature is often too powerful for artificial and arbitrary restrictions. (ARYAN, BRAHMANISM, EURASIAN, MUTINY, MISSION.)

2. Fig.: Any distinct rank or class of society, especially if it shut its ranks against the ingress of strangers.

"Caste and rank are not the same, though in many cases they interpenetrate and support each other. The man of highest rank in India is the Governor-General, who takes precedence even of the highest Hindoo Rajahs (kings); but by caste law he is an outcast, not higher than a Pariah. The relations between white and dark men, specially if the latter be negroes, are essentially caste relations. The generality of Europeans or Americans would never think of legally intermarrying with negresses, regarding them as doomed by their colour to be for ever the inferiors of the white man. The hereditary nobility of Britain are not, strictly speaking, a caste, despite their legislative privileges; one born a commoner can be created a nobleman, but no Sudra can, by any process of creation known to man, be made a Brahman.

"But to be subjugated by an inferior caste was a degradation beyond all other degradations."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ix.

"Her manners had not that repose Which stamps the caste of Vere de Vere."
Tennyson: Lady Clara Vere de Vere

¶ Caste Christians: Hindoo converts who have not been required at baptism to surrender their castes. The converts of the great missionary, Christian Frederick Swartz, who laboured in India from 1750 to 1798, and those of many of his successors, were caste Christians; but the great majority of modern Protestant missionaries insist on caste being renounced at baptism; those of the Roman Catholic Church, on the other hand, permit it to be retained.

"The hound turneth again to his casting, and a sow that is washen in wallowing in fenne." —Wycliffe: 2 St Peter ii. 22.

II. Technically:

1. Metallurgy:

(1) The act of forming metal in a mould.

* It is believed that the art of shaping metal by the hammer, chisel, and graver is older than that of casting it in a melted state in a mould. But casting is of very considerable antiquity, thus the golden calf made by Aaron was first "molten," i.e., melted and then graved (Exod. xxxii. 4, 24), and the brass (copper or bronze) vessels for Solomon's temple were also cast (1 Kings vii. 46, 47). Cast-iron statues are mentioned by Pausanias about A.D. 120, but nothing else of cast-iron is known to have existed in classic times. About A.D. 1709 John Thomas, a Welsh boy, devised an effective method of casting iron, and he and his master successfully carried out the process (which was long kept a secret) at Coalbrookdale. It is now one of the great industries in Britain, and other manufacturing countries possessed of coal and ironstone. [Founding.]

"After this manner he made the ten bases: all of them had one casting, one measure, and one size." —1 Kings vii. 37.

"... every thing betokens great perfection in the casting of metals during the bronze period." —Keeble: Horæ Feriales, p. 54.

(2) That which is cast in a mould.

2. Nat. Hist.:

(1) The act of moulting.

"The casting of the skin is, by the ancients, compared to the breaking of the serpentine or awl, but not rightly, for that were to make every casting of the skin a new birth." —Bacon: Natural & Experimental History.

(2) The cast feathers, excrements of hawks, &c.

3. Bee-keeping: A swarm. [Cast, s., B. 5.]

4. Building: A coating of lime or plaster.

5. Joinery: The bending of the surfaces of a piece of wood from their original position, either by weights, or by unequal exposure to the weather

6. Sculpture: The taking casts of impressions of figures, busts, medals, &c.

7. Pottery: The act of stamping clay ware. Delicate objects, which cannot be readily moulded by pressing the clay into the mould, are cast by the following process. The plaster mould being closed, the slip or cream clay is poured in, and the portion nearest to the mould becomes hardened by the absorption of the water by the mould. The fluid portion is then poured out, and the mould partially dried. A second supply of slip yields another coating, and the process is repeated as often as may be necessary to give the required thickness to the casting. (Knight.)

8. Theat.: The assigning of parts in a play. (Webster.)

* Casting is used in combination with many prepositions, as a casting away, a casting off, &c., for the meanings of all which see the corresponding uses of the verb

Casting of the heart: A mode of divination used in Orkney.

"They have a charm also whereby they try if per sone be in a decay or not and if they will die thereof, which they call Castenig of the Heart." —Brand: Orkn., p. 82.

cas-ū-ăl, a. & s. [Fr. casuel; Ital. casuale; Lat. casualis = pertaining to chance; casus = chance.]

A. As adjective:

1. Happening by chance, accidental.

"Of the broad vale, casting a casual glance,
We saw a throng of people—wherefore met?"
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. ii.

But of them, he adds, treated the subjects briefly . . . hout diligence or accuracy, deriving his infor . . . ly from casual reports."—Lewis: Cred. Early Roman Hist. (1858), ch. iv., § 12, vol. i., p. 94.

2. Dependent on chance; uncertain.

"The revenue of Ireland, both certain and casual, did not rise unto ten thousand pounds."—Dav.: On Ireland.

3. Trivial, commonplace.

"The commissioners entertained themselves by the fireside in general and casual discourses."—Clarendon.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between accidental, incidental, casual, and contingent. "Accidental is opposed to what is designed or planned; incidental to what is premeditated; casual to what is constant and regular; contingent to what is definite or fixed. A meeting may be accidental, an expression incidental, a look, expression, &c., casual, an expense or circumstance contingent." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(2) He thus distinguishes between occasional and casual. These are both opposed to what is fixed or stated; but occasional carries with it more the idea of unfrequency and casual that of unfixedness, or the absence of all design. A minister is termed an occasional preacher who preaches only on certain occasions; his preaching at a particular place on a certain day may be casual." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

cas-ū-ar-i-nā-ce-æ, s. pl. [From Mod Lat. casuarina, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: An order of abnormal exogens, alliance Amentales. Only one genus is known, Casuarina. They have a one-celled ovary, one or two ascending ovules, and a superior radicle. There are no leaves, but in place of them short, toothed, ribbed sheaths. They are trees like Giant Equiseta (Horse-tails) They have closer affinities, however, with Myricaceæ or with Coniferæ. They occur in Australia, New Caledonia, and the Indian Archipelago. They are generally called Beefwoods, their timber being of the colour of raw beef. In Australia they are often termed oaks. In Graham's Flora of Bombay one species is called the Casuarina or Tinian Pine. The heavy war-clubs of the native Australians are of Casuarina. The bark of Casuarina equisetifolia is slightly astringent; that of C. muricata is used as infusion in India as a tonic. The young cones of C. quadrivalvis, when chewed, yield a pleasant acid, and are useful to those who cannot obtain water Cattle also are exceedingly fond of them. About thirty-two species are known.

"It also treats the boys from cat's pellet and chuck farthing."—Bell Rellieum, 1560 (Hart. Misc. vii. 430).

cat's purr, s.
Physiol. : A sound like the purring of a cat heard by means of the stethoscope cat's skin, s.

Naut. : A light partial current of air, as with the cat's paw.

cat's-smore, s.
Bot. : An old name for a plant, Arnoglossum (Prompt.) cat's-spear, s.

Bot. : Typha latifolia (Gerarde.)

cat's tail, catstaile, s.
Botany :
1. The book-name of several plants—(1) Equisetum, Horse tail, various species, especially E. arvense, (2) Typha latifolia, (3) Typha minor, or smaller Bulrush, (4) Acorus major, (5) Phleum pratense, from the shape of the spike (Cat's tail grass), (6) Lythrum salicaria, (7) Amaranthus caudatus.
2. The catkins of the hazel or willow.
3. The catkins of Juglans regia.
4. A long round substance that grows in winter upon most trees, pines, &c.

Cat's-tail grass, cat's-tail grasse :
Bot. : A general book-name for Phleum pratense and other species. (Britten & Holland.)

"Great catstaile grasse hath very small roots. The small catstaile grasse is like unto the other, differing chiefly in that it is lesser than it."—Gerarde. Her. vall. p. 11 (ed. 1633).

cat, v.t. [Cat, s.]
Naut. : To bring up to the cat-head
¶ When the cat is hooked, and cable enough veered and stoppered, the anchor hangs below the cat head, swings beneath it, it is then hauled close up to the cat head by the purchase called the cat fall. The cat stopper is then passed, and the cat-block unhooked. (Smyth.)

 cat-a-bap-tist, s. [Gr. καταβαπτιστης (katabaptistēs), from κατα (kata) = down, against, and βαπτιστης (baptistēs) = a baptizer; βαπτιζω (baptizō) = to baptize.] One who abuses or is against baptism

"Of these anabaptists or catabaptists who differ no more than Pacuvius and Accius. Alstedius maketh fourteen sorts."—Fooling. Lapsers Logs, p. 42.

 cat-a-bá-si-on, s. [Gr. καταβασιον (katabasion), from κατα (kata) = down, and βασις (basis) = a going. Βαινω (bainō) = to go.] Eccles. Arch. : A chamber or crypt under a church, where relics were kept.

cat-a-brō-sis, s. [From Gr. κατάβρωσις (katabrōsis) = an eating up, a devouring; so named from the erose appearance of the glumes.]
Bot. : Whorl-grass. A genus of Graminaceæ (Grasses), Tribe, Festuceæ. Catabrosa aquatica, the Water Whorl-grass, is a British species, growing on the banks of rivers or floating in pools of water.

cat-a-caus-tic, a. & s. [Fr. catacaustique, from Gr. καταυαυστικος (katakaustikos), from κατα (kata) = down, and καυστικος (kaustikos) = burning; καιω (kaiō) = to burn.]
A. As adjective :
Geom. & Optics : Relating to or of the nature of the curve described in B.
B. As substantive :
Geom. & Optics :
1. Sing. : A curve formed by joining the points of concourse of several reflected rays proceeding from one radiating point.
2. Pl. : The caustic curves formed by the reflection of the rays of light.

cat-a-chre-sis, s. [Low Lat. catachresis; Gr. καταχρησις (katachrēsis) = a misuse, from καταχρησθαι (katachrēsthai) = to misuse; κατα (kata) = back, against, and χρησις (chrēsthai) = to use.]
Rhet. : The abuse of a trope, when the words are too far wrested from their native signification, or when one word is abusively put for another, for want of the proper word at, a more beautiful to the ear. (Smith. Rhetoric.)

cat-a-chrē-tic,  cat-a-chrē-ti-cal, a. [Gr. καταχρηστικος (katachrēstikos) = of or pertaining to catachresis.] In the manner of a catachresis, involving a catachresis, improper, far fetched

"A catachrestical and far derived equitude it holds with men, that is, in a fabrication."—Sir Geo. Vulgar Errours.

 cat-a-chrē-tic-al-ly, adv. [Eng. catachretical; -ly.] In a catachrestic manner, in a forced or exaggerated manner.

"Where, in divers places of Holy Writ, the deposition is against glosses to be expressed, it is frequently to be taken but catachretically."—Bacon, iv. 1 6 cat-a-cly-sm, s. [Fr. cataclysme, from Gr. καταυλυσμος (kataklusmos) = a deluge, from κατα (kata) = down, and καυδω (kludō) = to wash over.]

* 1. Gen. Lang. : A deluge, an inundation

"The opinion that held these cataclysms and many more universal, was such as held that it put a total extinguishment upon things in this lower world."—Bishop Hall's Contemplations, bk. iii. cont. 2.

2. Geol. : A sudden or violent rush of water, considered as the efficient cause by which certain phenomena have been produced, rather than by the gradual action of moderate currents, or by that of ice cat-a-cly-smal, a. [Eng. cataclysm; -al.] Of, pertaining to a cataclysm; caused by or arising from a cataclysm cat-a-comb (b silent), s. [Fr. catacombe; Ital. catacomba; Sp. & Port. catacumba, from Low Lat. catacumbæ = a catacomb, from Gr. κατα (kata) = down, and κυμβη (kumbē) = a hole, a hollow.] Subterraneous cavities for the burial of the dead, supposed to be the caves and cells where the primitive Christians hid and assembled themselves, and where they interred the martyrs; which are accordingly visited with devotion. The most celebrated are those near Rome, but there are many others in various parts of the world. The catacombs of Paris are simply charnel houses. The word is also occasionally used in the general sense of an excavated burying-place.

"On the side of Naples are the catacombs which must have been full of stench, if the coal bodies that lay in them were left to rot in open pits here."—Addison.

cat-a-cou-stics, s. [In Fr. catacoustique, from Gr. κατα (kata) = against, and ακουστικος (akoustikos) = pertaining to hearing, ακουω (akouō) = to hear.]
1. Physics : That science which treated of reflected sounds or echoes
2. Fortific. : Small galleries which communicate with a gallery parallel to the covert way. (Crabb.)

cat-a-di-ŏp-tric, cat-a-di-ŏp-tri-cal, a. [Fr. catadioptrique, from Gr. κατα (kata) = against, and διοπτρικος (dioptrikos) = pertaining to the διοπτρα (dioptra) = a levelling staff, from δια (dia) = through, and οπτεσθαι (optesthai), verb. adj. from οραω (horaō) = to look, to see.] [Dioptrics.]
Optics : Pertaining to or involving both the reflection and refraction of light, as a catadioptric telescope.

catadioptric-light, s. A mode of illumination for lighthouses in which reflection and refraction are unitedly employed. It was suggested by Allan Stevenson in 1834. From their subjecting the whole of the available light to the corrective action of the instrument, they have been called holophotal lights (Knight.) cat-a-di-ŏp-trics, s. [Catadioptric.] The science which treats of or is connected with the use of catadioptric instruments.

 cat-a-drome, s. [Gr. καταδρομος (katadromos), from κατ. (kata) = down, δρομος (dromos) = a course; δραμειν (dramein), 2 aor. inf. of τρεχω (trechō) = to run.]

1. A race-course.

2. A machine for hoisting heavy weights.

ca·tăd′-rō-mous, a. [CATADROME.] A term applied to certain fish, which descend from fresh water to the sea to spawn. The opposite of anadromous (q.v.).

* cat′-a-dūpe, s. [Gr. καταδουπος (katadoupos) = falling with a heavy noise—a term applied to the cataracts of the Nile; κατά (kata) = down, and δοῦπος (doupos) = a dead, heavy sound.]

1. A cataract or water-fall, especially one of those of the Nile.

2. A person living near the Nile cataracts.

"The Egyptian catadupes never heard the roaring of the fall of Nilus, because the noise was so familiar unto them."—Brewer Lingua (1657), iii.

căt′-a-falque (falque as falk), * cat-a-fal′-co, s. [Ital. catafalco = a scaffold, funeral canopy; Sp. catafalco; O. Fr. escatafaud; Fr. catafalque and échafaud; from O. Sp. catar = to see, to view, and Ital. falco, for palco =a scaffold, a stage.]

CATAFALQUE.

1. A temporary bier or structure of carpentry-work,decorated with paintings, &c., and used in funeral solemnities.

2. A kind of open hearse or funeral car.

* căt′-ag-măt′-ic, a. & s. [Fr. catagmatique, from Gr. κατάγμα (katagma) = a fracture, from κατάγνυμι (katagnumi) = to break; κατά (kata) = down, ἄγνυμι (agnumi) = to break.]

A. As adjective:

Surg.: Having the property or quality of uniting or consolidating broken parts or fractures.

"I put on a catagmatick emplaster, and, by the use of a laced glove, scattered the pituitous swelling, and strengthened it."—Wiseman: Surgery.

B. As subst.: A medicine having such property or quality.

* căt′-a-graph, s. [Gr. καταγράφη (katagraphē) = a drawing, a delineation; from κατά (kata)= down, and γραφή (graphē) = a drawing; γράφω (graphō) = to write, describe.] The first draught or outline of a picture; also, a profile.

căt-a-lan, a. & s. [Catalonia, a district of Spain.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Catalonia.

B. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: A native of Catalonia.

2. Blasting: A blast-furnace for reducing iron ores, extensively used in the north of Spain, particularly in the province of Catalonia. It consists of a four-sided cavity or hearth, which is always placed within a building and separated from the main wall thereof by a thinner interior wall, which in part constitutes one side of the furnace. The blast-pipe comes through the wall, and enters the fire through a tuyere which slants downward. The bottom is formed of a refractory stone, which is renewable. The furnace has no chimneys. The blast is produced by means of a fall of water, usually from 22 to 27 feet high, through a rectangular tube, into a rectangular cistern below, to whose upper part the blast-pipe is connected, the water escaping through a pipe below. This apparatus is exterior to the building, and is said to afford a continuous blast of great regularity; the air, when it passes into the furnace, is, however, saturated with moisture. (Knight.)

căt-a-lĕc′-tic, * căt-a-lĕc′-tick, a. & s. [Lat. catalecticus, from Gr. καταληκτικος (katalēktikos) = stopping short, from κατά (kata) = down, and λήγω (lēgō) = to stop.]

A. As adjective:

Pros.: Stopping short; used of a rhythm which is incomplete by reason of its being short by a syllable (or more) of the full measure.

"A stanza of six verses, of which the first, second, fourth, and fifth, were all in the octosyllabic metre, and the third and last catalectick; that is, wanting a syllable, or even two."—Pyrenaïc: On Chaucer's Versification.

B. As subst.: A verse which is incomplete, wanting a syllable at the end.

* căt-a-lăc′-tics, s. [Gr. καταλάσσω (katallassō) = to exchange; from κατά (kata) = down, back, and ἀλλάσσω (allassō) = to change.] The science of exchanges, now called political economy.

căt-a-lĕp′-sis, căt-a-lĕp′-sy, s. [Gr. κατάληψις (katalēpsis) = a sudden seizure; from κατά (kata) = down, and λῆψις (lēpsis) = a seizing; from λαμβάνω (lambanō) = to take, to seize.]

Med.: A form of mental disorder, akin to hysteria, which is characterised by the person affected falling down suddenly in a state of real or apparent unconsciousness, and, save for some occasional muscular twitchings of the face and body, remaining rigid and statue-like for a period of time which varies from one minute to some hours or even days, and then all at once recovering consciousness as if aroused from sleep—as a rule with no bad consequences to follow. Catalepsy almost invariably affects hysterical people only, and it is the prolongation of the unconscious condition to some days in certain extreme cases which has given rise to the fear which some people have of being buried alive under such circumstances. It is needless to say that the evidence of death is unmistakable to the scientist, and cannot be confounded with a state of catalepsy.

"There is a disease called a catalepsis, wherein the patient is suddenly seized without sense or motion, and remains in the same posture in which the disease seized him."—Arbuthnot.

căt-a-lĕp′-tic, a. [Gr. καταληπτικός (katalēptikos) = liable to catalepsy; ληπτικός (lēptikos) = liable to be seized, λαμβανω (lambanō) = to seize.] Pertaining to or of the nature of catalepsy; subject to catalepsy.

* cat-al′-o-gize (or g hard), v.t. [Gr. καταλογίζομαι (katalogizomai) = to reckon up, to compute.] To enumerate in a catalogue, to catalogue (q.v.). (Coles.) căt′-a-lōgue (ue silent), * cat-a-log, * cat-log, s. [Fr. catalogue; Lat. catalogus, from Gr. κατάλογος (katalogos) = a reckoning, a catalogue; κατά (kata) = down; λόγος (logos) = a telling, an enumerating; λέγω (legō) = to tell.]

I. Ord. Lang.: A list or systematic enumeration of articles generally in alphabetical order.

¶ In America, Scotland, and formerly in England, applied to persons, as a catalogue of the students of a college, but in England used only of things.

"The catalogue might be increased with several other authors of merit, . . ."—Goldsmith On Polite Learning, ch. viii.

II. Astron.: A list of stars, with materials appended for indicating their latitudes and longitudes, or their declinations and right ascensions.

catalogue raisonné, s. A catalogue of books, paintings, &c., classed according to their subjects, with explanatory remarks.

† căt′-a-lōgue (ue silent), v.t. [CATALOGUE, s.] To enumerate in a catalogue, to make a list or catalogue of.

"He so cancelled, or catalogued, and scattered our books, as from that time to this we could never recover them."—Harrington Brief View of the Church, p. 80.

căt′-a-lōg-ŭer, s. The compiler of a catalogue. (Notes & Queries, Aug. 28, 1886, p. 167.)

căt′-a-lōg-uing (u silent), pr. par., a., & s. [CATALOGUE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb)

C. As subst.: The act of enumerating or setting down in a list or catalogue

"This is the task much heavier than the mere cataloguing of scientific achievements."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3rd. ed.), xiii. 380.

căt′-a-lōg-uist, s. A cataloguer. (Notes & Queries, Aug. 28, 1886, p. 166.)

căt′-a-lōg-uize (u silent), v.t. [CATALOGUE.]

cat-aw′-ba, s. [From the native Indian name in Carolina, where it was discovered by Catesby in 1726.]

Bot.: A genus of Bignoniaceæ, comprising four or five species of trees, natives of the West Indies, North America, Japan, and China. They have been introduced into Europe, and are cultivated in France, Germany, and the south of England. The wood is remarkably light, of a greyish-white colour, and fine texture. It is capable of receiving a brilliant polish, and when properly seasoned is very durable. The bark is reputed tonic, stimulant, and antiseptic, and the honey from the flowers poisonous. (Treas. of Bot.) A decoction of the pods of Catalpa syringæfolia is used in Italy as a remedy for catarrh, dyspnœa and coughs.

* căt′-ăls, s. pl. [CATTLE, CHATTEL.]

Law: Goods and chattels. (Wharton.)

ca-tăl′-y-sis (pl. ca-tăl′-y-ses), s. [Gr. κατάλυσις (katalusis) = a dissolving; κατά (kata) = down, and λύω (luō) = to loosen.]

1. Physics: The effect produced by the presence of a substance, which itself undergoes no permanent change, in facilitating a chemical reaction.

2. Ord. Lang. (Fig.): A dissolution or end, decay.

"While they were in thoughts of heart . . . it, the end catalysis did come, and swept away . . . hundred thousand of the nation."—Sir Tho. More.

căt-a-lỹt′-ĕ-type, s. [From Gr. κατάλυσις (katalusis) = a dissolving, and τύπος (typos) = a blow; the impress of a blow; an outline, a type.]

Photog.: A calotype process in which paper is first prepared with a syrup of iodide of iron, instead of the iodide of potassium. The name was given to the process to express the supposed fact that the gradual development of the picture is the result of a catalytic action. The true chemical reaction is not understood. (Knight.)

căt-a-lỹt′-ic, a. [Gr. καταλύτικος (katalutikos) from καταλύω (kataluō) = to dissolve.]

Chem.: Of or pertaining to the action or power called catalysis; having power to dissolve.

catalytic force, s.

Physics: That modification of the force of chemical affinity which determines catalysis.

"An interesting class of decompositions has attracted considerable attention, which as they ought to be accounted for on the ordinary laws of chemical affinity, have been referred by Berzelius to a power, or rather new form of the force of chemical affinity, which he has distinguished as the catalytic force, and the effect of its action as catalysis."—Graham: Elem. of Chemistry, p. 196.

cat′-a-mar-an, s. [Ceylonese native name cattū-maran = floating trees. (Malan.)]

1. A kind of boat, vessel, or, more accurately, raft or float used by the Hindoos of Madras, the island of Ceylon, and the parts adjacent. It is formed of three logs of timber secured together by means of three spreaders and cross lashings through small holes. The central log is much the largest, with a curved surface at the fore-end, which terminates in a wards in a point. The side logs are very straight in form, but smaller, and with their ends straight; these are fitted to the central one. The length of the whole is from twenty to twenty-five feet. The crew consist of two men. In the monsoons, when a catamaran is able to bear a sail, a small outrigger is placed at the end of two poles as a balance, with a bamboo mast and yard, and a mat or cotton sail. Frail as such a structure must appear it can pierce through the surf on the beach at Madras and reach a vessel in the bay when a boat of ordinary construction would be sure to founder. (Mr. Edye in Journal Royal Asiatic Soc., vol. i., pp. 4, 5.)

CATAMARAN.

"The catamarans used in the Brasils, and which are also common in the East Indies, consist of three logs of wood tapered at one end and barbed together. They are furnished with paddles, and are said to pull as fast as boats, the men being squatted in a kneeling position, and managing them with wonderful dexterity in passing the surf which beats on the shores. Those used in the Brasils also carry sail."—Young: Nautical Dictionary.

2. An incendiary raft. Used specially of those rafts with which on Oct. 2, 1804, Sir Sydney Smith in vain attempted to destroy the Boulogne flotilla designed by Napoleon for the invasion of England.

3. A scolding woman, a termagant. (This sense may be due to some erroneous association with cat.)

"What an infernal . . . catamaran."—Thackeray: Book-mus (ed. 1869), ii. 372.

cāt-ą-mē'-nī-ą, s. pl. [Lat., from Gr. κατάμηνια (katámēnia) = menses; κατά (katá) = down, μήν (mēn) = a month.]

Med.: The discharge of a sanguineous fluid from the womb, which, in the case of healthy women, occurs every month. The discharge is due to certain peculiar changes which take place in the Graafian vesicles of the ovaries. It begins at the age of puberty, a period which varies under varying conditions of climate and civilisation, and terminates in what is popularly called the "change or time of life," which occurs usually at about the age of forty-nine. The interval between these two periods is called the "child-bearing period." The term catamenia, though used largely by medical men, is not so well known as another, which has exactly the same meaning, viz., menses

"Two ancient Hindoo sages are of opinion, that if the marriage is not consummated before the first appearance of the catamenia, the girl becomes degraded in rank."—Dunn: On the Unity of the Human Species.

cāt-ą-mē'-nī-ąl, a. [Lat catamenia(a); -al.] Of or pertaining to catamenia or the menstrual discharge.

"The only marked exception occurs in the case of the Hindoo females, with whom, on an average, the catamenial flux appears about two years earlier than it does among other nations."—Dunn: On the Unity of the Human Species.

cat-ą-mint, s. [Catmint.]

† cat-ą-mite, s. [Fr., from Lat. catamitus = a corrupt form of Ganymedes; Gr. Γανυμήδης (Ganumēdēs = Ganymede, a boy who, for his exceeding beauty, was taken up to heaven by Jupiter's bird, the eagle, and made cup-bearer to the chief of the gods.] A boy kept for unnatural purposes.

"Among the Greeks, it was no disgrace for philosophers themselves to have their catamites."—Grew: Cosmologia Sacra, p. 128.

cāt'-ą-mount-ain, * kăt'-ą-mount-ain, cāt-ą-mount, s. [Eng. cat, and mountain or mount.]

Zoology:

1. The wild cat (Felis catus).

"Would any man of discretion venture such a gristle to the rude claws of such a kat-a-mountain?"—Beaumont and Fletcher: Custom of the Country.

2. The lynx (q.v.). (Amer.)

3. The cougar or puma (q.v.).

¶ Used as separate words.

"As cattes of the mountayn, they are spotted with diverse fykie fantasyes."—Bale: Discourse on the Revelation, p. 2, sign. d vi., 1550.

cāt-an-ăd'-rō-mous, cāt-ăn-drō-mous, a. [Gr. κατά (katá) = down, ἀνά (aná) = up, and δρόμος (dromos) = a running.]

Ichthy.: Applied to those fishes which pass once a year from salt water into fresh, and return again from the fresh to the salt.

cāt-ą-năn'-ch-ē, s. [Gr. κατανάγη (katanánkē), a strong incentive used by Thessalian women in their incantations; from κατά (katá) = down, and ἀνάγη (anankē) = necessity.]

Bot.: A genus of plants belonging to the cichoraceous tribe of compound flowers, distinguished by its scarious involucre and the awned chaffy scales which crown its fruit. They are principally natives of the south of Europe, and have white or blue flowers. They are perennials.

cāt-ą-păsm, s. [Gr. κατάπασμα (katapasma) = a sprinkling, a powdering; from καταπάσσω (katapassō) = to sprinkle, to powder, from κατά (katá) = down, and πάσσω (passō) = to sprinkle.]

Med.: A dry medicine in powders, used for sprinkling on ulcers, for absorbing perspiration, &c. They were divided into diapasma, empasma, and sympasma. (See these words.)

 cāt-ą-pĕl'-tic, a. & s. [Gr. καταπελτικός (katapeltikos) = pertaining to a catapult; καταπέλτης (katapeltēs) = a catapult.] [Catapult.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to a catapult.

B. As subst.: A catapult.

 cāt-ą-pĕt'-ąl-oŭs, a. [Gr. κατά (kata) = down, πεταλον (petalon) = a leaf, and Eng. suff. -ous.]

Bot.: Having the petals slightly united by their inner edge near the base, as in the mallow; a form of polypetalous.

CATAPETALOUS.

"If the petals adhere to the bases of the stamens so as to form a sort of spurious monopetalous corolla, as in Malva and Camellia, such a corolla has been occasionally called cohypetalous, but this term is never used, all such corollas being considered polypetalous."—Lindley: Introd. to Bot., 3rd ed., p. 167.

cāt-ą-phŏn'-ic, a. [Fr. cataphonique; from Gr. κατά (kata) = down, back, and φωνη (phōnē) = a voice.] Of or relating to cataphonics.

cāt-ą-phŏn'-ics, s. [Eng. cataphonic.]

Math.: The doctrine or science of the reflection of sounds, a branch of acoustics.

cāt'-ą-phrăct, s. [Lat. cataphractes, from Gr. καταφράκτης (kataphraktēs) = a fully-armed soldier, from καταφράσσω (kataphrassō) = to cover; κατά (kata) = down, quite, φράσσω (phrassō) = to enclose, to cover.]

 I. Ordinary Language:

1. A horse-soldier in complete armour.

". . . before him pipes
And timbrels; on each side went armed guards,
Both horse and foot; before him and behind Archers and slingers, cataphracts and spears."
Milton: Samson Agonistes.

 2. Armour, defence. (Lit. & fig.)

"In a battle we fight not but in complete armour. Virtue is a cataphract; for in vain we arm one limb, while the other is without defence."—Feltham. Resolves, ii. 8.

II. Technically:

1. Ichthy.: The armour or plate covering some fishes. (Dana.)

 2. Mil.: A piece of ancient armour formed of cloth or leather, strengthened with iron scales or links, covering either a part or a whole of the body, and sometimes the warrior's horse as well.

CATAPHRACT.

cāt-ą-phrăc'-tą, s. pl. [Cataphract.]

Ichthy.: A name sometimes given to the Triglidæ or Gurnard family of fishes. [Triglidæ.]

cāt-ą-phrăc'-tĕd, a. [Eng. cataphract; -ed.]

Zool.: Covered with a cataphract, or armour of plates, scales, &c., or with hard, bony, or horny skin.

cāt-ą-phrўg'-i-ąn, s. pl. [In Lat. cataphrygæ, because their leaders came originally from Phrygia.]

Ch. Hist.: A "heretical" sect which arose in the second century A.D. They are said to have followed the opinions of Montanus. It is said that they forbade marriage, baptised their dead, and mingled the blood of young children with the bread and wine in the Eucharist.

cāt-ą-phўl'-lar-ў, a. [Eng., &c., cataphyll(um); -ary.] Of the nature of, or pertaining to, a cataphyllum (q.v.).

cataphyllary-leaves, s. pl. Scale leaves.

cāt-ą-phўl'-lūm, s. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. καταφύλλος (kataphullos) = leafy.]

Bot.: A rudimentary leaf preceding a stage of growth; e.g. one of the cotyledons of an embryo, one of the scales of a bud, &c.

 cāt-ą-phўs-ic-ąl, a. [Gr. κατά (kata) = down, against; and Eng. physical (q.v.).] Opposed to nature.

"Falling under hyper-physical or cata-physical laws."—De Quincey: Anom. Sketches, i. 227.

II. Technically:

1. Surg.: An affection of the sight, in which the crystalline lens of the eye is more or less opaque, and objective vision either wholly or partially prevented. Cataract is of two kinds, viz., hard and soft. Hard cataract is most common amongst old people. Soft may occur at any age, but is found most frequently amongst children, and especially amongst those who have been born with this condition: in the latter case it is called congenital cataract. Traumatic cataract is so called when it is the result of a wound of the lens. Cataract is very recognisable in children, in whom it presents a bluish-white appearance like milk-and-water in the pupil of the eye; in aged persons the colour is much darker and less distinct, and therefore more difficult to see, but a careful examination will detect the opacity in the lens.

"Saladine hath a yellow milk, which hath likewise much acrimony; for it cleanseth the eyes: it is good also for cataracts."—Bacon: Nat. Hist.

2. Mech.: A kind of water-governor for regulating the action of an engine. (Weale.)

cāt'-ĕ-chĭne, s. [Eng. catech(u), and suff. -ine (Chem.) (q.v.).]

Chem.: $C_9H_{10}O_4$. A weak acid extracted from catechu by hot water. It crystallises in colourless needles. When heated it yields pyrocatechine, $C_6H_6O_2$. It gives a green colour with ferric salts; does not form insoluble compounds with gelatine.

* cāt'-ĕ-chĭs, s. [CATECHISM.]

"And of thir wellis of grace ye haue large declaratioun maid to yow in the third part of this catechis, quhilk intruitis of the sevin sacramentis."—Abp. Hamilton's Catechisme (1551), fol. 79, b.

* cāt-ĕ-chĭ-zā'-tion, * cāt-ĕ-chĭ-zā'-tion, s. [Low Lat. catechizatio; from catechizo.] The act or practice of catechizing.

". . . the catechization of young chaplains in the rudiments of our faith, . . ."—Harmer: Records, pt. ii., bk. i., No. 53. Oglethorpe's Submission.

cāt'-ĕ-chīze, cāt'-ĕ-chīse, v.t. [From Low Lat. catechizo = to catechize; from Gr. κατηχίζω (katēchizō) = to catechize, instruct; from κατηχέω (katēchĕō) = to din into one's ears; κατα (kata) = down, and ἠχή (ēchē) = a sound; ἦχος (ēchos) = a ringing in one's ears.]

1. Lit.: To instruct by means of question and answer.

"And because Prudence would see how Christiana had brought up her children, she asked leave of her to catechize them."—Bunyan: The Pilgrim's Progress, pt. ii.

". . . his memory was long cherished with exceeding love and reverence by those whom he had exhorted and catechised."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. v.

2. Figuratively:

(1) To question closely, to examine.

"I'm stopp'd by all the fools I meet,
And catechis'd in ev'ry street." Swift.

* (2) To chastise, to reprove.

"And as it were in catechising sort,
To make me mindful of my mortal sins."

Marlowe: Jew of Malta, ii. 2.

* cāt'-ĕ-chĭze, s. [CATECHISE, v.] A catechism.

"The Articles, Creeds, Homilies, Catechize and Liturgy."—Gauden: Tears of the Church, p. 55.

cāt'-ĕ-chĭzed, cāt'-ĕ-chĭzed, pa. par. or a. [CATECHISE, v.]

"This is an admirable way of teaching, wherein the catechized will at length find delight and by which the catechiser, if he once get the skill of it, will draw out of ignorant and silly souls even the dark and deep points of religion."—G. Herbert: Country Parson, ch. xxi.

cāt'-ĕ-chĭz-ĕr, cāt'-ĕ-chĭ-zĕr, s. [Eng. catechiz(e); -er.] One who catechizes.

"In 1550 he [Jewell] was admitted to the reading of the sentences, and during the reign of King Edward VI. became a zealous promoter of reformation and a preacher and catechizer at Sunningwell, near to Abingdon, in Berks."—Wood: Athenæ Oxon., vol. i., p. 169.

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

C. As subst.: The act or process of instructing or examining by way of question and answer.

"O God defend me! how am I beset!— What kind of catechizing call you this?"

Shakesp.: Much Ado, v. 1.

"About two months of every summer he [Whitefield] was preaching, catechising, and confirming daily in church."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxi.

cāt'-ĕ-chĭsm, s. [Low Lat. catechismus, from catechizo.] [CATECHISE.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) A form of instruction, pr. rote, by means of question and answer, especially in the principles of religion; the act of so instructing or being instructed.

". . . for the first introduction of youth to the knowledge of God, the Jews even till this day use their catechisms."—Hooker

(2) An elementary book in which the principles of religion are familiarly explained in the way of question and answer.

"To say, ay, and no, to these particulars is more than to answer in a catechism."—Shakesp.: As You Like It, iii. 2.

(3) Any primer or elementary book of instruction in any branch of art or science in the way of question and answer.

* 2. Fig.: Anything which affords matter for question.

"He had no catechism but the creation to read, no study but reflection, and read no book but the book of the world."—South.

II. Ecclesiol. & Ch. Hist.: In the same sense as I. (2) (q.v.). The first germ whence the Book of a Christian "catechism," formally so called, grew, was furnished by St. Paul, when he wrote 1 Cor. xiv. 19, he said "ἵνα καὶ ἄλλους κατηχήσω" (hina kai allous katēchēsō), Authorised Version, "that by my voice I might teach others also" (literally, might catechise others also). The first Christian catechisms are said to have been composed in the eighth or ninth century. Luther published a short catechism in 1520, and his larger and smaller ones in 1529. The Geneva Catechism was sent forth in 1536. The Church of England Catechism was first published in 1549 or 1551, but in a shorter form than now; the additions which enlarged it to its present dimensions were made by James I.'s bishops by his order in 1604, and the work issued in its complete form in 1612. The catechism of the Orthodox Greek Church was published in 1542. In 1566 the Council of Trent produced a catechism of course Roman Catholic in its teaching. The Rakovian Catechism, which is Socinian, was put forth in 1574, and the shorter and larger catechisms of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, now used in the Church of Scotland and other Presbyterian churches, appeared the former in 1647, and the latter in 1648.

cāt'-ĕ-chĭst, s. [Gr. κατηχιστής (katēchistēs)] One who instructs others, pr. viva voce, by means of question and answer, in the rudiments of religious knowledge.

"None of years and knowledge was admitted who had not been instructed by the catechist in the foundation, which the catechist received from the bishop."—Hammond: Fundamentals

* cāt-ĕ-chĭs'-tĭc, * cāt-ĕ-chĭs-tĭ-cāl, a. [Eng. catechist; -ic, -ical.] Of or pertaining to the office of a catechist, or to the act of instructing by way of question and answer.

"S. Cyril was the authour of those catechistical means of institutions which are mentioned by St. Jerome."—Bp. Cosin: Canon of Scripture, § 18.

* cāt-ĕ-chĭs'-tĭ-cāl-lỹ, adv. [Eng. catechistical; -ly.] Catechetically; by way of question and answer.

"The principles of Christianity briefly and catechistically taught them, is enough to save their souls."—South: Serm. vii. 109.

cāt'-ĕ-chŭ, s. [Fr. cachou; Ger. katechu; Mod. Lat. catechu; from the Cochin-Chinese cayeou.]

1. A gum furnished by the Acacia catechu. It is called also Terra Japonica. In the west of India it obtains the name of Kutch, and is collected by a tribe of people called Kuttorees. (Proceed. of Bomb. Geog. Society, May, 1838.)

2. Pharm.: Catechu pallidum, or Pale Catechu, is an extract from the leaves and young shoots of Uncaria gambir; it is prepared at Singapore. It occurs in cubical yellowish-brown porous pieces, with a dull, earthy fracture and a bitter astringent taste, sp. gr. 1·4. It is soluble in alcohol. It consists chiefly of catechin, a white powder, m.p. 217°, formula $C_{30}H_{18}O_8$; and of catechutannic acid, a yellow porous substance, $C_{15}H_{10}O_7$. It is soluble in water; on exposure to the air a solution turns red. Catechu has been used prevent the formation of boiler incrustations. Catechu is a very powerful astringent; . . . is used in diarrhœa and in cases of hæmorrhage and mucous discharge. It is chewed, and the juice gradually swallowed in relaxed conditions of the uvula, palate, &c.

"Catechu, absurdly called Terra japonica, . . . is prepared by boiling the alips of the interior of the wood in water, evaporating the solution to the consistence of syrup over the fire, and then exposing it to the sun to harden. It occurs in flat rough cakes, and under two forms. The 'cut,' or Bombay, is of uniform texture, and of specific gravity 1·28. The second is more friable and less solid. It has a chocolate colour, and is marked inside with red streaks. Areca nuts are also found to contain catechu."—Ure: Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

catechu-tannic, a. An expression used chiefly or exclusively in the subjoined compound.

Catechu-tannic acid: [CATECHU, Pharm.] cat-e-chū'-ic, a. [Catechu; -ic.] Of or pertaining to catechu.

catechuic acid, s. [CATECHINE.]

cat-e-chū'-mĕn, s. [Gr. κατηχούμενος (katēchoumenos) = one who is orally instructed; from κατηχεω (katēcheō) = to din in; κατα (kata) = down, and ηχη (ēchē) = a noise, a din.] One who is still under instruction in the principles of the Christian religion; a neophyte.

"The prayers of the church did not begin in St. Austin's time, till the catechumens were dismissed."—Bellingham

¶ In the first century, according to Mosheim, all who professed faith in Christ were immediately baptized; but in the second century the practice arose of requiring applicants for baptism to submit for a time to be instructed as catechumens before the initiatory rite was administered to them. Whilst they continued in this preparatory state they were regarded as the lowest order of Christians. They were distinguished from the fideles (or faithful), not only by name, but also by their place in the church, where they sat in the gallery. They were not allowed to assist at the celebration of the Holy Communion, but were dismissed after the sermon with the words, "Ite, catechumeni, missa est." Nor were they allowed to vote at meetings of the church. The instructions given them varied according to the mental capacity which they severally displayed.

cat-e-chū'-mĕn-āte, s. [Eng. catechumen; -ate.] The state or condition of a catechumen.

cat-e-chū-mĕn'-i-cal, a. [Eng. catechumen; -ical.] Of or pertaining to catechumens.

cat-e-chū'-mĕn-ist, s. [Eng. catechumen; -ist.] A catechumen.

". . . those catechumenists spoken of, . . ."—Bishop Hooper: Oath fork Apostle, p. 248.

cat-e-cu-mel-yng, s. [Eng. catechumen(s); dim. suff. -ling.] A young catechumen.

"To baptize barnes that ben catecumelynges."—Langland: P. Ploweman, 6738.

cat-e-gŏr'-ĕm, s. [Gr. κατηγόρημα (katēgorēma).] Categoremetic word.

"Similarly, names are called categorematic words, or categorems, because they can be predicated independently of any other word. Some logicians would exclude adjective names from the class of categorems, and restrict the latter to substantive names only. As a proof of it is, they say that an adjective cannot stand as subject of a proposition unless accompanied by the definite article, and in the plural number."—Fowlers Elements of Logic, ch. ii.

cat-e-gŏr-ē-mat'-ic, a. [Gr. κατηγόρημα (katēgorēma) = a predicate.] [CATEGORY.]

Logic: Capable of being used as a term (used of a word).

†cat-e-gŏr-e-mat'-i-cal, a. [Eng. categorematic; -al.] The same as CATEGOREMATIC (q.v.).

"Can there possibly be two categorematical, that is, positive substantial infinites?"—Jeremy Taylor: Real Presence, sec. 11, § 16.

†cat-e-gŏr-e-mat'-i-cal-ly, adv. [Eng. categorematical; -ly.] In a categorematic manner.

"By this rule it is necessary (against Aristotle's great grounds) that some quantitative bodies should not be in a place, or else that quantitative bodies were categorematically infinite."—Jeremy Taylor. Real Presence, sec. 11, § 29.

cat-e-gŏr'-i-cal, a. [Eng. categor(y); -ical.]

1. Of or pertaining to a category.

"A single proposition, which is also categorical, may be divided again into simple and complex."—Watts: Logic.

2. Absolute, positive; not admitting of conditions or exceptions.

"They could never obtain a categorical answer."—Clarendon.

cat-e-gŏr'-i-cal-ly, adv. [Eng. categorical; -ly.] In a categorical manner; absolutely, positively, expressly.

"I dare affirm, and that categorically, in all parts wherever trade is great, and continues so, that trade must be nationally profitable."—Child: Discourse of Trade.

cat-e-gŏr'-i-cal-nĕss, s. [Eng. categorical; -ness.] The quality of being categorical, or positive.

"The word of Mr. Boyse's that he has made notorious is categoricalness . . ."—Marvell: Works, vol. ii., p. 188.

cat-e-gŏr-ize, v.t. [Eng. categor(y); -ize.] To insert in a category or list; to class.

cat-e-gŏr-y, s. [Lat. categoria; Gr. κατηγορια (kategoria) = an accusation, a speech; κατηγορεω (kategoreō) = to accuse, to affirm, to predicate; κατα (kata) = against, and αγορευω (agoreuō) = to harangue, to assert; αγορα (agora) = an assembly.]

1. Logic: One of the predicaments or classes to which the objects of thought or knowledge can be reduced, and by which they can be arranged according to a system.

"The absolute infinitude, in a manner, quite changes the nature of beings, and exalts them into a different category."—Cheyne ¶ Aristotle made ten categories, viz., substance, quantity, quality, relation, action, passion, time, place, situation, and habit. For the categories of Kant, see KANTIAN-PHILOSOPHY.

2. A condition, state, class, or predicament.

"Twelve categories were framed, some of which were so extensive as to include tens of thousands of delinquents; and the House resolved that, under every one of these categories, some exceptions should be made."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

3. Used to denote a list or a class of persons accused.

"Our noblemen and others should get no pardon, whether fortuited or not,—by and atour princes and noblemen in England set down in the same category."—Spalding, ii. 261.

cat-ĕ-lĕc'-trōde, s. [Gr. κατα (kata) = down, against, and Eng. electrode (q.v.).]

Electro-chem.: The negative electrode or pole of a galvanic battery. [CATHODE.]

ca-tē'-na, s. [Lat. catena = a chain.] A chain or series of things connected with each other.

". . . an undoubtedly logical catena of proposals . . ."—Daily Telegraph, March 14, 1877.

Catena di trilli: [Ital.]

Music: A chain, or succession, of short vocal or instrumental shakes. (Stainer & Barrett.) catena patrum.

Ch. Hist.: Lit., chains of the Fathers. A series of extracts from commentaries by the Fathers on particular portions of Scripture. From about the sixth to at least the ninth century these almost wholly superseded personal effort on the part of professed expositors.

cat-ĕ-nār'-i-an, a. [Lat. catenarius = of or belonging to a chain; catena = a chain.] Of the nature of or resembling a chain.

Arch.: A form of arch, the reverse of the curve taken by a chain or heavy rope when suspended between two points. (Casell's Technical Educator, vol. i., p. 197.)

CATENARIAN ARCH.

catenarian-curve, s.

Geom.: A curve formed by a chain or rope of uniform density, hanging freely from any two points not in the same vertical line. It is of two kinds, the common, which is formed by a chain equally thick or equally heavy in all its points; or uncommon, formed by a thread unequally thick, that is, which in all its points is unequally heavy and in some ratio of the ordinates of a given curve. The catenarian curve, or catenary, was first observed by Galileo, who proposed it as the proper figure for an arch of equilibrium. He imagined it to be the same as the parabola. Its properties were first investigated by John Bernoulli, Huygens, and Leibnitz. It is now universally adopted in suspension-bridges. Each wire assumes its own catenary curve, and the cable is formed of bunches of aggregated strands.

"The back is bent after the manner of the catenarian curve, by which it obtains that curvature that is safest for the included marrow."—Cheyne: Philosoph. Prin.

cat'-ĕ-nar-y, a. & s. [Lat. catenarius = of or pertaining to a chain; catena = a chain.]

A. As adj.: Of the nature of or resembling a chain.

B. As subst.: A catenarian-curve (q.v.).

cat'-ĕ-nāte, v.t. [Lat. catenatus, pa. par. of catena = to connect by a chain; catena = a chain; O. H. Ger. fétina, chétinna; M. H. Ger. kétenne.] To connect by a chain; to join into a continuous series. (Bailey.)

cat'-ĕ-nā-tĕd, pa. par. or a. [CATENATE, v.] Connected by a chain; made into a series.

cat'-ĕ-nā-ting, pr. par., a., & s. [CATENATE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: The act of joining by a chain, or of forming into a continuous series.

cat-ĕ-nā'-tion, s. [Lat. catenatio, from catено = to chain; catena = a chain.] The act of joining into a continuous series; a regular or connected series.

"Which catenation, or conserving union whenever his pleasure shall divide, let go, or separate, they shall fail."—Browne: Vulgar Errours, bk. v., ch. 5.

cat-ĕn'-u-lāte, a. [Lat. catenula = a little chain, dimin. of catena = a chain.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Consisting of little links, as in a chain.

II. Technically:

1. Nat. Hist.: Having on the surface a series of oblong tubercles resembling the links of a chain.

2. Bot.: Formed of parts united end to end like the links of a chain.

cā'-tēr (1), v.t. [CATER (1), s.] To purchase provisions; to supply food

"He that doth the ravens feed,
Yea providently caters for the sparrow,
Be comfort to my age."

1. To make a noise as cats in rutting time.

"The very cats caterwauled more horribly and pertinaciously there than I ever heard elsewhere."—Coleridge: Table Talk.

2. To make any harsh or disagreeable noise.

* B. Trans.: To woo. (Said of cats.)

"She licks her fair round face, and frisks abroad,
To show her fur, and to be caterwaul'd."
Pope: The Wife of Bath, 146-7

cāt'-ẽr-wāul'-ĭng, pr. par., a., & s. (Caterwaul, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & partic. adj.: (In senses corresponding to those of the verb.)

"Was no dispute between The caterwauling brethren?" Hudibras.

C. As subst.: The act of making a harsh, disagreeable noise; squalling.

"Whata caterwauling do you keep here!"—Shadwell: Twelfth Night, ii. 3.

 cāt'-ẽr-y, s. [O. Fr. cateria.]

1. A place where provisions are kept.

2. The office or duty of a catere

 cātes, s. pl. [Said to be a contraction of Eng. delicates = luxuries, but more probably from O. Eng. acate, achate = provisions.] [Cate.] Provisions, food; especially dainties or delicacies.

"We'll see what cates you have,
For soldiers' stomachs always serve them well."
Shakesp.: 1 Hen. VI., ii. 3.

cātes-bē'-ą, s. [From Catesby, who wrote on the botany of the West Indies.]

Bot.: A genus of Cinchonads, found in the West Indies. The fruit of Catesbæa spinosa is yellow, pulpy, and of an agreeable taste. (Treas. of Bot.)

cāt'-gŭt, s. [Eng. cat, and gut.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The name given to the material of which the strings of many musical instruments are formed. It is made from the intestines of the sheep, and sometimes from those of the horse, but never from those of the cat. (Steiner & Barrett.)

"With wire and catgut he concludes the day.
Quavering and counterquavering care away."
Cowper: Progress of Error.

2. A kind of coarse linen or canvas.

II. Technically:

1. Botany:

(1) Tephrosia Virginiana, from its long, slender, tough roots.

(2) Sea-laces, Chordaflum.

2. Taxonomy: The string which connects the fly and the mandril.

cāth'-ą, s. [From the Arabic name kât, or cafta.]

Bot.: A genus of plants belonging to the order Celastraceæ. The species are mostly natives of Africa, forming small shrubs, sometimes with spiny branches. Catha edulis is a native of Arabia, and from the leaves the Arabs make a beverage possessing properties analogous to those of tea or coffee. Under the name of kât, or cafta, the leaves form a considerable article of commerce amongst the natives. Chewed, they produce wakefulness and hilarity of spirits.

cą-thāi'-ąn, a. [Cathay.] Of or pertaining to Cathay, or China.

"From the destined walls Of Cambala, seat of Cathaian Chan."
Milton: P. L., xi. 393

Cāth'-ą-rine, Cāth'-ẽr-ine, s. & a. [Probably from Gr. καθαρός (katharos) = clean, pure.]

A. As substantive: A frequent female Christian name. The name of several saints in the Roman calendar. The most celebrated was a virgin of royal descent in Alexandria, who publicly confessed the Christian faith at a sacrificial feast appointed by the emperor Maximinus; for which confession she was put to death by torture by means of a wheel like that of a chaff cutter. [Catharine-wheel.]

¶ To braid St. Catharine's tresses: To live a virgin

B. As adj.: (See the compounds).

catharine-pear, s. A variety of pear, small in size.

"His constant and regular assisting at the cathedral service was never interrupted by the sharpness of weather."—Locke.

II. Figuratively:

1. Ancient, from cathedrals being, as a rule, ancient; venerable, or it may be with the idea of the resemblance of an avenue of trees to the aisle of a cathedral.

"Here aged trees cathedral walks compose,
And mount the hill in venerable rows." Pope.

2. Emanating from a bishop's seat of authority; hence, authoritative, official.

"What solemnity can be more required for the pope to make a cathedral determination of an article?"—Bp. Taylor.

cathedral-church, cathedrall-church, s. The same as CATHEDRAL, A., I. 1.

"Her body [Mary of Scotland] was embalmed, and entered with due and usuall rites; and afterwards interred with a royall funerall in the cathedrall-church of Peterborough."—Camden: Eliz., an. 1587.

cathedral-music, s. A term applied to that music which has been composed to suit the form of service used in our cathedrals since the Reformation. It includes settings of canticles and also of anthems. The first writers of this class of music were Marbecke, Tallis, Tye, and Byrd. The style of the earliest cathedral music was formed on the model of the Italian motets and other sacred compositions, and with the exception of a difference in the words was identical with the secular music of the period. (Mainer & Barrett.) cathedral-preferments, s. pl.

Eccles. Law: All dignities and offices in a cathedral or collegiate church inferior to that of the bishop. They are chiefly deaneries, archdeaconries and canonries. (Stephens, Wharton, &c.)

† II. Fig.: Liberal, not narrow-minded.

B. As substantive:

1. A member of the Christian Church.

2. Now generally applied to a member of the Roman Catholic branch of the Christian Church.

Catholic Church, s

1. Ecclesiol.: (For definition see example.)

"The 1st and largest sense of the term Catholick Church, is that which appears to be the most obvious and literal meaning of the words in the text cited, xii. 23.) 'The general assembly and church of the first-born which are written in heaven,' that is, the whole number of those who shall finally attain unto salvation.—2ndly. The Catholick or Universal Church signifies in the next place, and indeed more frequently, the Christian Church only, the Christian Church, as distinguished from that of the Jews and patriarchs of old; the Church of Christ spread universally from our saviour's days over all the world; in contradistinction to the Jewish Church, which was particularly confined to one nation or people.—3rdly. The Catholick Church signifies very frequently, in a still more particular and restrained sense that part of the Universal Church of Christ, which in the present age is now living upon earth; as distinguished from those which have been before and shall come after.—4thly and lastly, The term Catholick Church signifies in the last place, and most frequently of all, that part of the Universal Church of Christ, which in the present generation is visible upon earth, in an outward profession of the belief of the Gospels, and in a visible external communion of the word and sacraments.—The Church of Rome pretends herself to be—this Whole Catholick Church, exclusive of all other societies of Christians."—Clarke, vol. i., ser. 62.

2. Church History:

(1) Previous to the Reformation: Like most other words used in ecclesiology, the term Catholic was borrowed at first from the New Testament. It occurs in some editions of the Greek original—including that issued in connection with the recent revision,—in the titles prefixed to the Epistles of James, 1 & 2 Peter, 1 John, and Jude [CATHOLIC EPISTLES], and is the word translated "general" in the Authorised Version of the Bible. The first to apply it to the Church was the Apostolic Father, Ignatius. When he and his successors used it they meant to indicate that the church of which they constituted a part comprised the main body of believers, and was designed, as it was entitled, to be universal. In this sense the Church was opposed to the sects and separate bodies of "heretics" who had separated themselves from it and were now outside its pale. This is the fourth sense given in the example under No. 1.

When, in the eighth century, the separation between the Eastern and Western Churches took place, the latter retained as one of its appellations the term "Catholic," the Eastern Church being contented with the word "Orthodox," still used by the Russian emperors in their politico-ecclesiastical manifestoes. [ORTHODOX.] The history of this earlier portion of the Catholic Church will be best treated of in the article Christianity (q.v.). (See also Greek, Latin, Eastern, and Western.)

(2) Subsequently to the Reformation: When the Protestant churches separated from their communion with Rome in the sixteenth century, those whom they had left naturally regarded them as outside the Catholic pale. They, on the other hand, declined to admit that this was the case, and the term "Catholic Church" is used in the English Liturgy apparently in the sense of all persons making a Christian profession. "More especially we pray Thee for the good estate of the Catholick Church . . . that all who profess and call themselves Christians . . ." (For the history of the Church of Rome, see ROMAN CATHOLICS.)

Catholic Emancipation Act:

"An evil fortune attended all our attempts at re-establishing a cattery."—Southey: The Doctor, p. 60.

† cāt'-tish, a. [Eng. cat; -ish.] Feline, cat-like.

cāt'-tle, * ca-tel, s. & a. [A different form of the word chattel. In the pastoral age in England, as in other countries, the wealth of any man of substance was naturally estimated by the number of cattle that he possessed. Hence the word cattle came to mean what we now should call a man's chattels; on the same principle as the Latin word pecunia = money, from pecus = cattle.]

A. As substantive:

I. Literally:

* 1. Property, wealth, goods.

"A woman that hadde a flux of blood twelve yeer and hadde spended all hir catel [Gr. βίον (bion) = life, or living: Vulgate, omnem substantiam suam: Auth. Eng. Vers.: all her living] in leechis."—Wycliffe: Luke viii. 43, 44.

* 2. Property consisting of live stock, as distinguished from goods.

"The first distinction made of live stock from other property was to call the former quick cattle."—Sir J. Harrington: Epigrams, i. 91. (Trench: Select Glossary, pp. 30, 31.)

¶ Afterwards the word chattel was introduced for property without life.

3. Beasts of pasture, both wild and domestic.

¶ The word cattle is generally limited to the varieties of the ox and its congeners. These are sometimes called black cattle, though not all black, and horned cattle though some are horniless, hence the term "neat cattle" has been suggested for them. For the different species of ox, see Bos, Bovidæ. The chief breeds are distinguished, among other characteristics, by the length of their horns. The chief long-horned cattle are the Dishley breed, so called from Dishley Farm, in Leicestershire, where Robert Bakewell reared them; they have now become degenerate, and short-horns are in repute. Besides these, the Devon, Sussex, and Hereford breeds are worth mention. In the United States no new breeds of cattle of special worth have been produced, but there have been large importations of improved breeds from Europe, particularly of the short horns, which are highly valued. The Jersey and Guernsey breeds are much esteemed here. The Hereford, Ayrshire, Holstein, and other breeds have been introduced.

"And God made the beast of the earth after his kind, and cattle after their kind, and every thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind."—Gen. i. 25.

II. Fig.: Used in a slighting sense of human beings.

"Boys and women are for the most part cattle of this colour."—Shakesp. As You Like It, iii. 2.

B. As adjective: (See the compounds).

cattle-feeder, s. An arrangement in a cattle-stable for supplying the feed in regulated quantities to the rack or manger.

cattle-gate, s. Common for one beast. (Wharton.) cattle-leader, s. A nose-ring or gripper for the septum of the nose, whereby dangerous cattle may be fastened or led. (Knight.) cattle-plague, s.

1. Gen.: Any plague by which large numbers of cattle are destroyed. Such plagues have existed at intervals, more or less, in all countries and in all ages. Among the severer visitations in centuries preceding the nineteenth may be mentioned a great plague which arose in Hungary in 1711, whence it spread to other countries, destroying in the next three years about one and a half millions of cattle. A second visitation, which affected England and the West of Europe between 1745 and 1756, caused the death of about three millions of cattle.

2. Spec.: The disease above referred to failed to reach the United States, but the herds of this country have been seriously affected by a later disease, which is supposed to have originated in Central Europe, and spread thence all over the world. This disorder, known as Pleuro-pneumonia, cannot be traced back further than 1769, when it was known in Eastern France as Murie. It appeared in Germany in 1802, Russia in 1824, Great Britain and Ireland in 1841, the United States in 1843, Australia in 1858, and New Zealand in 1864. It is contagious in character, and so far has only been checked by the slaughter of infected cattle, though inoculation has proved somewhat successful, particularly in Australia. Great numbers of cattle have died from this disease, and strenuous measures are being adopted for its eradication. [Foot-and-Mouth Disease, Pleuro-Pneumonia.]

cattle-pump, s. A pump which is operated by the cattle coming to drink, either by their weight upon a platform or by pressing against a bar which gives way before them, they following it around in a circular track and operating the piston. (Knight.) cattle-raik, s. A common, or extensive pasture, where cattle feed at large. (Scotch.) cattle-range, s. Any open space over which cattle may range or feed.

cattle-stall, s. A means for fastening cattle at their mangers or racks other than by halter or tie. It usually consists of a pair of parallel vertical stanchions, at such distance apart as to admit the neck of the animal. One stanchion is movable to allow the head of the animal to pass, and is then replaced and held by a latch or pin. (Knight.)

cāt-tlĕ-ya, s. [Named by Lindley after William Cattley, Esq.]

Bot.: An extensive genus of orchids, natives of Central America and Brazil, where they are found on the bark of trees and on rocks. The species bear two or more flowers, generally rose-coloured, but occasionally yellow.

eâu'-eus, s. [A corruption of caiker's-house = a caiker's shed. (Chambers' Encyc., i. 790.) On March 2, 1770, a quarrel occurred in Boston between the soldiers and some rope-makers, in which the latter were overpowered and beaten. The people were greatly exasperated at this, and sought opportunities for retaliation. On the 5th of the same month, in a similar affray, the soldiers fired upon the people of the town, killing and wounding several. This induced the ropemakers and caikers, whose occupations brought them into contact, to form a society, at the meetings of which inflammatory addresses were delivered, and the most violent resolutions passed against the British government and its agents and instruments in America. The tories in derision called these assemblies caikers' meetings, and the term was at length corrupted to caucus (Knickerbocker Mag.) But its origin has been shown to be of earlier date, and the Cent. Dict. suggests Mod Lat. caucus, Mod. Gr. καῦκος (kaukos) = a cup.] A private meeting of the representatives of any political party previous to an election, for the purpose of selecting candidates and making other arrangements for the promotion of party interests. "Then the most respectable Protestants with Blackheath at their ground, were forced to make common cause with the Papists."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

¶ (1) Crabb thus distinguishes between cause, reason and motive: "Cause respects the order and connection of things; reason the movements and operations of the mind; motive the movements of the mind and body. Cause is properly generic, reason and motive are specific: every reason or motive is a cause, but every cause is not a reason or motive. Cause is said of all inanimate objects; reason and motive of rational agents. Whatever happens in the world has some cause, mediate or immediate: the primary or first causes of all is God: whatever opinions men hold they ought to be able to assign a substantial reason for them, and for whatever they do to have a sufficient motive. As the cause operates with or to the effect, so does the reason or birth to the conclusion, and the motive or inducement to action." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

II. Intrans.: To show cause or reason.

"But he, to shifte their curious request, Gan [illegible] why she could not come in place."—Spenser: F. Q., III. ix. 28.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to cause, to occasion, and to create: "What is caused seems to follow naturally; what is occasioned follows incidentally; what is created receives its existence arbitrarily. A wound causes pain, accidents occasion delay, but bodies create mischief. The misfortunes of the children cause great affliction to the parents; business occasions a person's late attendance at a place; disputes and misunderstandings create animosity and illwill." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

"Each true word a blister, and each false
Is a red-hot cautering to the soul,—to the tongue, Consuming it with speaking."
Sheldon. Timon of Athens, v. 2.

¶ The first folio reads cauthorizing.

cau-ter y, s. [Gr. καυτηριον (kautērion) = a branding-iron, from καιω (kaiō) = to burn, to brand.]

1. An instrument for burning or searing the flesh, either with a hot iron, or with caustic medicines.

"In heat of fight it will be necessary to have your actual cautery always ready. . . ."—Wiseman. Surgery.

2. The act of cauterizing.

"Cautery is either actual or potential; the first is burning by a hot iron, and the latter with caustic medicines. The actual cautery is generally used to stop a mortification, by burning the dead parts to the quick, and stop the effusion of blood, by searing up the vessels."—Quincy.

cau thee, s. [A word from one of the Hindoo languages.]

Botanics: A coarse East India cotton cloth.

cau thing, s. [Shortened from cauterying (q.v.).]

Farriery: An iron used for cauterizing the flesh of horses.

cau-tion, * cau-ci-on, * cau-ti-on, * cau-ci-oun, * cau-ti-oun, s. [Fr. caution; Sp. caucion; It. cauzione, from Lat. cautio = a taking out from cautus = careful, cautious, from caveo to take care, to be cautious.]

1. Security, pledge, guarantee.

"Whereupon they bolde give me bolde."
K. Alisaunder, 2811.

"He . . . objects any crime, ought to give caution by the . . . of sureties, that he will persevere in the prosecution of such crimes." Ayliffe's Parergon.

¶ In this sense the word only survives in Scots law, and at the Universities. [CAUTION MONEY.]

*2. A bail; an account.

"The . . . cautions, and sette some and write . . ."—Wyclif: Acts xvi. 6.

3. Provision or security against danger . . . precaution, carefulness, circumspection, prudence, heedfulness, watchfulness:

"In despite of all the rules and cautions of government . . ."—I. Watts.

"Schomberg and some other officers recommended caution and delay."—Macaulay. Hist. Eng., ch. . .

4. A warning, advice to be careful and provident.

"Indulge, my son, the cautions of the wise."
Pope. Homer's Odyssey, bk. xxiii. 16.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between an admonition, a warning, and a caution: "An admonition respects the moral conduct; it comprehends reasoning and remonstrance. Warning and caution respect the personal interest or safety in. We admonish a person against the commission of any offence; we warn him against any danger, we caution him against any misfortune." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

¶ Caution juratory

Law: The best security that a suspended can offer in order to obtain a suspension. (Wharton.) caution-money, s. A sum of money deposited by a person as security, as by a student on his matriculation at the Universities.

¶ To find caution: To bring forward a sufficient surety. (Scotch.)

"Cautione must be found . . . the defender for his appearance, and to pay what shall be decreed against him."—Sir Thomas Hope. Minor Practicks.

To set caution: To give security. (Sylvan. with the preceding phrase.)

"He was ordained also to set caution to Prendraught."—Spalding.

cau tion, v.t. [CAUTION, s.] To give a warning to, to warn.

(a) Absolutely:

"How shall our thought avoid the various snare?
Or wisdom to our cautions avail declare?"

(b) With against. (Used principally of persons.)

"You . . . cautioned me against their snares, But never gave me equal alms."

cau-tion-ar-y, a. [Low Lat. cautionarius = to give security.]

A. As adjective:

1. Given as a pledge . . . security:

"I am made the . . . pledge
The gage and hostage of your keeping it."

2. Containing a caution or warning.

"Nay, if you look a little farther, you will see . . . these ways are made cautionary enough."—Bunyan. Pilgrim's Progress, pt. ii.

3. Wary provident, cautious.

"Most of the . . . crimes of the philosophers are fearful and . . . wary than the nature of things quireth."—Bacon. Advancement of Learning, bk. ii.

B. As subst.: A pledge, a security or guarantee.

cau tioned, pa. par. & a. [CAUTION, v.]

cau tion er, s. [Eng. caution; -er.]

* 1. Ord. Lang.: One who cautions or warns another.

II. Scots Law: One who is bound as security for the performance by another of a specific act; a surety or guarantee.

"All burdens, as to and . . . ances made or to be made, . . . for the guide . . . the Barbours and Waiters . . . shall . . . attended as . . . the aires and successors of the . . . written . . . cautioners."—Acts Ja. V., Parl. 1567 . . .

cau tion ing, pr. par., a. [CAUTION, v.]

A. & B. As pres. pa. par./particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of becoming or giving a caution for another.

". . . outcome of the . . . marries Pan and sires the Ba . . . who slaughters in matrimony . . . to the Asian . . . ber to the ardent inhabitance of a bag . . . s, to cautionize that part."—Continental Monthly, 1864. (Latham.)

cau tion-ry, s. [Eng. caution; -ry.] The . . . becoming security for another; suretyship, guarantee.

That the true creditors and cautioners of the said defaulted persons . . . waves be prejudged by the foresaid fortaulter . . . their relief of their just and true engagements, and cautionries, . . ."—Acts Chas. I., 1644, vi. 167.

cau tious, a. [Lat. cautus = heedful, wary, to be careful or wary.] Full of caution, wary, heedful, careful.

I. Of persons:

"My lord Clarendon will do well to be cautious for the future."—Macaulay. Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

2. Of qualities:

"... less reverence from the outer gate,
As the slave, whose office there to wait. . . ."
Byron. The Corsair, ii. 3.

¶ With of before the person or thing to be guarded against:

"Be cautious of him, for he is sometimes so . . . ignorant lover, because he makes a great ado about . . ."—Swift.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between cautious, wary, and circumspect. "These epithets denote a particular care to avoid evil; but cautious expresses less than the other two; it is necessary to be cautious at all times, to be wary in cases of peculiar danger, to be circumspect in matters of peculiar delicacy and difficulty. . . . A tradesman must be cautious in his dealings with all men, he must be wary in his intercourse with designing men, he must be circumspect when transacting business of particular importance and intricacy." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(2) For the difference between careful, cautious, and prudent, see CAREFUL.

cau tious-ly, adv. [Eng. cautious; -ly.] In a cautious manner, warily, heedfully.

"The well employed, he pay heard friends and fame,
But cautiously observed from whence it came."
Dryden. The Fables. Palamon and Arcite, bk. i.

". . . in return for money cautiously doled out, . . ."—Macaulay. Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

cau tious ness, s. [Eng. cautious; -ness.] The quality of being cautious, vigilance, circumspection.

"I could not but approve their generous constancy and cautiousness."—King Charles. Eikon Basil.

ca va ha wa, s. [A Polynesian word.] An intoxicating beverage prepared from Macropiper methysticum.

cav-a bard, s. [Etymology unknown.] A thick fall of snow. (Scotch.) ca-va-ci um, s. [Lat., from cavum aedium = the hollow part of a house: cavum, neut. sing. of cavus = hollow, aedium, genit. of aedes = a house.]

Arch.: An open quadrangle or court within a house. Vitruvius describes five varieties:—Tuscanum, Corinthium, tetrastylon (with four columns), displuviatum (uncovered), and testudinatum (vaulted). Some authors have made the cavædium the same as the atrium, and vestibulum, but they were essentially different. (Smith.) cav al-cade, s. [Fr. cavalcade; a riding of horse. (Cotgrave.)] A pa . . . n or train of men on horseback.

"When sweetness was more resplendent made By the mere passing of that cavalcade."
Longfellow. Tales of a Wayside Inn. Scrivano's Tale.

cav al-cade,* v.t. [CAVALCADE, s.] To go or ride in procession.

He would have done his noble fa . . . better service than cavalcading with him to . . . ard."—North. Examen, p. 114.

cav-al-er o, cav-a-lier-o, s. [CAVALIER.] A quasi-Spanish form of the word cavalier, used generally with somewhat of a burlesque meaning.

"Nothing good he meant, but to help cavaliero Colwebb to scratch."—Shakesp. Mid. Night's Dream, iv. 1.

"How now, bully rook? thou'rt a gentleman: cavalere-justice, I say."—Shakesp. Merr. Wives of Windsor, ii. 1.

cav-a-lier, s. & a. [Fr. cavalier; Ital. cavaliere; Sp. caballero; all from Low Lat. caballarius = a horseman, from caballus = a horse.] [CAPLE.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1 Generally:

(1) A knight, a horseman.

"Now joy to the creat . . . the brave Cavalier!
He his banner unconquered, resistless he spear."
Scott: Rokeby, v. 20.

(2) A gallant.

"For who is he, whose chin is but enriched
With one appearing hair, that will not follow
These cull'd and choice dra . . . cavaliers to France?"
Shakesp. . . . V., iii. Prologue.

2 Spec.: Applied to themselves by the royalist party in the civil war under Charles I.

"During some years they were designated as Cavaliers and Roundheads. They were subsequently called Tories and Whigs, nor does it seem that those appellations are likely soon to become obsolete."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. i.

* II. Fortif.: A work situated behind another, over which it has a command of fire.

"Our casemates, cavaliers and counterscarps, Are well survey'd by all our engineers."
Heywood. Four Ps.

B. As adjective:

1. Knightly, warlike.

* 2. Noble, generous, brave.

"The people are naturally not valiant, and not much cavalier."—Sandys.

3. Belonging to the Cavalier or Royalist party.

". . . an old Cavalier family. . . ."—Stirrett: Gentility, bk. iii., ch. iii.

4. Haughty, disdainful.

* căv-ą-lïĕr'-ĭşm, s. [Eng. cavalier; -ism.] The principles or customs of cavaliers. (Scott.)

căv-ą-lïĕr'-lў, adv. [Eng. cavalier; -ly.]

1. Lit.: Like a cavalier.

2. Fig.: Arrogantly, haughtily.

* căv-ą-lïĕr'-nĕss, s. [Eng. cavalier; -ness.] Arrogance, haughtiness.

* căv-ą-lï-ēr' ō, s. [Ital. cavaliere.] A cavalier.

"In short, he was a perfect cavaliero." Byron: Beppo, v. 33.

căv'-ą-lĕt, s. [Fr. cavalet.]

Mil.: An ancient cannon five feet long, throwing a 1-lb. ball, with a charge of 1 lb.; range, 900 paces.

căv-ą-rў, * că-văl'-lēr-ĭe, s. [O. Fr. chevalerie; Fr. cavalerie; Sp. caballeria; Ital. & Port. cavalleria.] [CAVALIER.]

Mil.: Mounted soldiers organised in troops (an administrative unit, commanded by a captain and two lieutenants), squadrons (a tactical unit of two troops, led by the senior captain), and regiments (composed of four squadrons, commanded by a lieut.-colonel and a major). Divided in Europe into Heavy (Cuirassiers, and some Dragoons or Dragoon Guards), Medium (Lancers and Dragoons), and Light (Hussars). Attached by single regiments to the infantry divisions. In the United States the cavalry are of light equipment and known only by the single name of cavalry. They are separate from infantry, being organized into distinct corps and under separate commanders. During the Civil War, cavalry proved to be a highly effective branch of the army. They are formed into brigades or divisions (commanded by a brigadier or lieutenant-general), for independent action in advance of and covering an army on the march, when horse-artillery batteries are attached to them. Light cavalry are chiefly employed for reconnaissance and foraging, heavy and medium for battle, but these duties are interchangeable. Formations for march are columns of troops, fours, sections, and half-sections; for fighting, always in line, frequently in echelon of regiments or squadrons, and with a reserve. Its action is essentially offensive, and its real power lies in the charge, which should be sudden and rapid. Its best opportunity is when the enemy is on the march, in disorder from fighting, or changing formation. The best ground for cavalry is that which gives cover from view till near enough to charge, and then it should be free from obstacles, so as to get full benefit from the shock which depends on unbroken speed. Rate of march—walk, four miles; trot, eight miles an hour.

"If a state run most to gentlemen, and the husbandmen and ploughmen be but as their workfolks, you may have a good cavalry, but never good stable bands of foot." Baron Bac. VII

¶ Originally cavalry and chivalry were but two different ways of spelling the same word. (Trench: Eng. Past and Present, p. 65.)

* cą-vāte', v.t. [Lat. cavatus, pa. par. of cavo = to hollow out.] To hollow or dig out; now superseded by excavate (q.v.). (Bailey.)

* cą-vāt'-ĕd, pa. par. & a. [CAVATE.]

căv-ą-tĭn'-ą, s. [Ital.] A melody of a more simple form than the aria. A song without a second part and a da capo. (Stainer & Barrett.)

* cą-vāt'-ĭng, pr. par., a., & s. [CAVATE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & partic. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: The act of hollowing out or excavating.

* cą-vā'-tion, * cą-vā'-zion, s. [Low Lat. cavatio = a hollowing or excavating; cavo = to hollow out, to excavate.]

Arch.: The hollowing or underdigging of the earth for cellarage or foundations; according to Vitruvius it should be the sixth part of the height of the whole building.

cāve (1), * hāve, s. & a. [Fr. cave; Sp. & Ital. cava = a hollow place; from Lat. cavus, from cavus = hollow.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A hollow place or cavern under the earth; a subterraneous habitation.

"Thor he biggede in a cave, the vas ther in roche graven." Story of Gen. & Exod., l. 107

"Thou magic lyre, whose fascinating sound Seduced the savage monsters from their cave."
Cowper: Ode on the Marriage of a Friend.

* 2. Any hollow place or part.

"The object of sight doth strike upon the pupil of the eye directly, whereas the cave of the ear doth hold off the sound a little."—Bacon: Natural History.

II. Technically:

1. Geol.: Caves in many cases are scooped out by the sea or by the action of inland streams. They are most numerous in limestone countries, and are of great interest geologically. [CAVE-DEPOSITS.]

2. Glass Manufacture: The ash-pit of a glass furnace.

B. As adj.: (See the compounds).

¶ Obvious compound: Cave-keeper.

cave-bear, s.

Palæont.: Ursus spelæus, a fossil bear, more gigantic than any now known to exist. It is found in Britain and elsewhere, in Post-Pliocene cave-deposits.

cave-breccia, s.

Geol.: A breccia, generally of marine origin, frequently met with in caverns at the base of sea-cliffs. It often contains organic remains. [CAVE-DEPOSITS.]

cave-deposits, s. pl.

Geol.: Deposits made in sea-caves. Water washed in some of the materials which were afterwards fixed in their place by the formation of stalactite pendulous from the roof, and stalagmite rising in irregular columns from the floor. According to the celebrated chemist Liebig, the vegetable soil above the limestone rock, when acted on by moisture and air, evolves carbonic acid (carbon dioxide). Falling rain, becoming impregnated with this chemical compound, is capable of dissolving the limestone, and subsequently losing by evaporation a portion of the carbonic acid, parts with the calcareous matter, which it leaves in the form of stalactite. The dropping of water impregnated with carbonate of lime from the tips of the pendulous stalactites, generates the stalagmites, and hermetically seals the aqueous deposits beneath for geological examination. It is remarkable that, tested by these organic remains, caverns do not, as might be anticipated, range over a succession of formations; they seem to be all but limited to the Newer-Pliocene and Post-Pliocene periods.

The first cave which attracted much geological notice was that of Kirkdale, about twenty-five miles N.N.E. of York city. In it were detected the remains of about 300 hyænas and the animals on whose bones they had preyed. (For details see Buckland's Reliquiæ Diluvianæ.) Many caves throughout the world have since been examined. Prof. Owen some years ago enumerated thirty-seven species of mammals—about eighteen of them extinct, the rest recent—in the caves of the British isles. When the question of the alleged "antiquity of man" came from France to Britain in 1858, the examination of caves here and elsewhere received a new impulse. First the Brixham cavern, on the coast of Devonshire, was exhaustively examined, and then Kent's cavern, near Torquay, in the same county, became the scene of very elaborate exploratory diggings, Mr. Pengelley, F.R.S., acting under the auspices of the British Association and the Royal Society of London, being the chief agent in the work. Deposits of some interest have been found in the caves of the United States and of Brazil, but no particular description of them seems necessary, as they yield no indications of ancient man similar to those of Europe. They contain bones of many of the former animals of the country, though usually of less interest than those of the European caves.

cave-dwellers, s. pl. [TROGLODYTE, A. 1. 1.]

cave-earth, s.

Geol.: A stratum of earth constituting the old floor of a cave, previous to the deposition of the stalagmite which now covers it.

"Cave-earth is not stratified, and contains many fallen fragments of rock, rounded stones, and broken pieces of stalagmite."—Lyell: Manual of Geol., ch. xiii.

cave-guarded, a. Guarded or protected in a cave.

cave-hyæna, cave-hyena, s.

Palæont.: Hyæna spelæa, an old British hyena akin to H. crocuta of South Africa, of which it may be only a variety.

"The cave-hyæna and cave-tiger are found associated with the Ursus spelæus in the caverns."—Lubbock: Prehistoric Times, p. 253.

* cave-keeping, a. Secret, retired from sight, as though hidden in a cave.

"In moss, as in a rough-grown grove, remain Cave-keeping evils that obscurely sleep."
Shirley: Lucrece, 1240-41.

cave-lion, s.

Palæont.: A fossil lion, Felis spelæa, akin to if not even identical with the F. leo of modern times.

cave-pike, s.

Palæont.: A species of Lagomys found in Post-Pliocene deposits in British caves.

cāve (2), s. [CAVE (2), v.]

1. A stroke, a push.

2. A toss.

cāve (1), v.t. & i. [CAVE, s.]

B. Intransitive:

1. To rush.

2. To be plunged or buried.

căv'-ē-ăt, s. [Lat. caveat = let him beware, 3rd per. sing. pr. subj. of caveo = to beware.]

I. Technically:

1. Law: A notice or warning given by any person interested to some public officer not to do a certain act until the party giving the notice has been heard in opposition.

"A caveat is an intimation given to some ordinary or ecclesiastical judge by the act of man, notifying to him, that he ought to beware how he acts in such or such an affair."—Ayliffe.

2. United States Patent Laws: A description of some invention designed to be patented, lodged in the office before the patent right is taken out, operating as a bar to applications respecting the same invention from any other quarter. It corresponds to the English Protection (q.v.).

II. Ord. Lang. (fig.): A warning, a caution, a protest.

"As, however, there is scarcely any one of the principles of a true method of philosophizing which may not require to be guarded against errors on both sides, I must enter a caveat against an error to which exposition, of a kind directly contrary to the preceding."
J. S. Mill: System of Logic, § 3.

Caveat emptor (Lat.): Let the purchaser beware, i.e., let him examine what he is buying before he completes the bargain; in other words, the risk of the purchase lies with the purchaser.

* căv-ē-ă'-ting, s. [Lat. caveat, and Eng. suff. -ing.] çease, * ceasen, * cesen, * cesse, * ceçym, * cesse, * cesse, v.i. & t. [O. Fr. cesser; Sp. cesar; It. cessare, from Lat. cesso = to go slowly, cease, frequent. of cedo = to give way, yield.]

I. Intransitive:

1. To come to an end, leave off, give over, desist.

(1) Absolutely:

"Cæsyn. Cesse."—Prompt. Parv.

"We shalle not cease, but ding all downe."—Townley Mysteries, p. 65.

(2) With an infinitive following:

"The stream will cease to flow."
Tennyson: All things will Die.

(3) With the prep. from:

"The lives of all who cease from combat, share."
Dryden.

2. To be at an end, to exist no longer.

"All charitie shal cease among the men . . . ere I."

* 3. To become extinct, to pass away.

"The inhabitants of the villages ceased, they ceased in Israel. . . ."—Judges, v. 7.

4. To rest, leave off for a time, desist from.

". . . without ceasing I make remembrance of thee in my prayers night and day."—2 Tim. i. 3.

II. Trans.: To put a stop to, to end.

"But he, her fears to cease, Sent down the meek-eyed peace."
Milton: Nativity, 6.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to cease, leave off, and discontinue:—"To cease is neuter; to leave off and discontinue are active; we cease from doing a thing; we leave off or discontinue a thing. Cease is used either for particular actions or general habits; leave off more usually and properly for particular actions; discontinue for general habits. A restless spoiled child never ceases crying until it has obtained what it wants; it is a mark of impatience not to cease lamenting when one is in pain. A labourer leaves off his work at any given hour. A delicate person discontinues his visits when they are found not to be agreeable. It should be our first endeavour to cease to do evil. It is never good to leave off working while there is any thing to do, and time to do it in. The discontinuing a good practice without adequate grounds evinces great instability of character." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) çease, s. [CEASE, v.] The end, extinction or failure.

"The cease of majesty
Dies not alone; but, like a gulf, doth draw What's near it with it."

Entom.: A genus of two-winged flies, Diptera, of the family Tipulidæ, having the wings resting horizontally with three longitudinal nervures; head hemispherical; antennæ as long as the body, and generally 24-jointed, the joints hairy (in females 14-jointed); the two basal joints short, legs long; basal joint of tarsi very short, second long. Stephens enumerates twenty-six species, all of which are of small size. Ceridomyia tritici, the Wheat-fly, is well known from its attacks on wheat.

çē-çĭl'-I-æns, s. pl. [Fr. cecilies, from Lat. cæcilia = a slow-worm or blind-worm; cæcus = blind.]

Zool.: A family and genus of naked vertebrates, placed by Linnæus and Cuvier among serpents, but now known to be amphibians. The eyes are exceeding small, whence the name given to them; the skin is smooth, viscous, and striated, with annular folds. It is not properly naked, but the scales are very minute and indistinct. All the species are natives of warm climates. [CÆCILIADÆ.]

 çē-çĭ-tȳ, s. [Fr. cécité, Lat. cæcitas = blindness; cæcus = blind.] Blindness.

"They are not blind, nor yet distinctly see; there is in them no cecity, yet more than a caligenosity; . . ."—Browne: Vulgar Errours, bk. iii., ch. xviii.

A. As substantive:

I. Scrip. & Bot.: A tree or trees called in Heb. אֶרֶז (erez), from אָרַז (araz), the root of מָרַץ (arats) = coiled, compressed. In Sept. Gr. it is κέδρος (kedros). Erez still continues in the Arab. arz, and seems to be a generic word, almost like the English cedar, but limited apparently to species of the pine family, of which several are on Lebanon, the three most notable being "the cedar of Lebanon," pre-eminently so called (Ps. xcii. 12, the Deodar [II. 1, and Deodar], and the Scotch fir (Pinus sylvestris). The masts for ships spoken of in Ezek. xxvii. 5 were probably from the Scotch fir; whilst the tree, of which it is said that "his boughs were multiplied and his branches became long," is plainly the typical "Cedar of Lebanon." The wood of that species is soft, and not specially valuable; and, contrary to the received opinion, the ores which furnished the beams, &c., of Solomon's temple, may have been from another species of Lebanon pine.

II. Ord. Lang. & Bot.: The English name given to various trees, chiefly of the orders Pinaceæ (Conifers) and Cedrelaceæ (Cedrelads).

1. (Of the order Pinaceæ):

(1) The Cedar of Lebanon (Abies cedrus, often called Cedrus Libani). From the allusion to it in Scripture it has, for many centuries, been an object of interest, and more than one hundred years ago Miller thus described it:—"It is evergreen; the leaves are much narrower than those of the pine-tree, and many of them produced out of one tubercle, resembling a painter's pencil; it has male flowers, or katkins, produced at remote distances from the fruit on the same tree. The seeds are produced in large cones, squamose and turbinated. The extension of the branches is very regular in cedar trees; the ends of the shoots declining and thereby showing their upper surface, which is constantly cloathed with green leaves so regularly as to appear at a distance like a green carpet, and, in waving about, make an agreeable prospect. The wood of this famous tree is accounted proof against the putrefaction of animal bodies. The sawdust is thought to be one of the secrets used by the mountebanks who pretend to have the embalming mystery. This wood is also said to yield an oil, which is famous for preserving books and writings; and the wood is thought by Bacon to continue above a thousand years sound." Many people suppose that to witness the cedars one must climb to the celebrated grove on Mount Lebanon, about 6,400 feet above the sea level, and 3,000 below the summit of the mountain, but there are more specimens of the tree in the gardens around London than in that grove. Here, of course, it is planted, but it is indigenous from Mount Taurus to the Himalayas, growing along with the Deodar, from which it may not be specifically distinct.

(2) Various junipers: Spec. (a) the Virginian Cedar (Juniperus virginiana), commonly called "the red cedar," from the colour of its wood, (b) the Bermuda Cedar (J. bermudiana), and (c) the Barbadoes Cedar (J. barbadensis), &c.

2. (Of the order Cedrelaceæ (Cedrelads): Various trees. Spec., Bastard cedar = any species of the genus Cedrela; Bastard Barbadoes Cedar (C. odorata); Cedar of Australia (C. australensis).

3. Of other orders: Various trees belonging to the Meliaceæ, Byttneriaceæ, &c.

B. As adj.: Pertaining to or made of the tree described under A.

cedar-bird, s.

Ornith.: A species of Chatterer, Ampelis carolinensis, also called the American Waxwing. It derives its name from its partiality to cedars.

cedar-wood, s.

1. Gen.: The wood of any of the ordinary cedars.

2. Spec.: A name given in Guiana to an easily worked and very aromatic wood, called also Curana, Samaria, Acayari, and Mara.

çē'-dared, a. [CEDAR.] Covered with or full of cedars. (Milton.) † çē'-dărn, a. [Eng. cedar, with adj. suff. -(e)n.] Made or consisting of cedar, cedrine.

A. & B. As pr. par., & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: The act of yielding or surrendering.

çē'-drāt, s. [Fr. cédrat; Ital. cedrato; from Lat. cedrus = a cedar.]

Bot.: A variety of citron-tree (Citrus medica).

çē-drē'-tĭ, s. [From Gr. κέδρος (kedros) = the cedar-tree.] A perfume derived from a variety of the aurantiaceous Lime, Citrus acida.

çē-drē'-lą, s. [A dimin. from Lat. cedrus = a cedar.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, the typical one of the order Cedreleæ. Cedrela odorata, or Barbadoes Bastard-cedar, a native of South America, has wood of a brown colour, very fragrant, and is imported under the name of Honduras, or Jamaica Cedar. C. Toona, a native of Bengal, furnishes timber much like mahogany. The bark is very astringent, and has been found valuable in fevers, dysentery, &c. The flowers are used for producing a red dye. The bark of C. febrifuga is used against the intermittent fevers of Java.

çē-drē-lā'-çē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. cedrel(a); and fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: A natural order of thalamifloral dicotyledons, placed by Lindley in his Rutal alliance. There are two sub-orders: 1. Swieteniæ; 2. Cedreleæ. They are natives of the tropics of America and India, and, very rarely, of Africa. They are generally very fragrant, aromatic, and tonic. Many supply compact and beautifully-veined timber, such as the mahogany of tropical America (Swietenia mahagoni); the Satin-wood of India (Chloroxylon Swietenia); the Yellow-wood of New South Wales (Oxleya xanthoxyla); the Red-wood of Coromandel (Soymida febrifuga), &c. The barks of Cedrela febrifuga and others are used as remedies in intermittent fevers and dyspeptic complaints. There are nine known genera and twenty-five species. (Treas. of Botany, &c.)

çē-drē-lē'-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. cedrel(a); and fem. pl. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: A sub-order of the order Cedrelaceæ (q.v.).

çē'-drĭn, s. [Lat. cedrinus = pertaining to cedar; cedrus = a cedar.]

Chem.: A crystallizable substance extracted from cedron by the action of alcohol. It has an intensely and persistently bitter taste.

çē'-drĭne, a. [Lat. cedrinus; from Gr. κέδρινος (kedrinos) = pertaining to cedar; Lat. cedrus; Gr. κέδρος (kedros) = cedar.] Of or pertaining to the cedar-tree; made of cedar.

çē'-drĭ-ŭm, s. [Lat., from cedrus = a cedar.]

Bot.: The pitch or resin of the great cedar-tree, which is used to rub over books and other articles to preserve them from moths, bookworms, &c.

çē'-drŏn, s. [From Lat. cedrus.]

Bot.: A tree, Simaba Cedron, a native of the hottest parts of New Granada. It yields to alcohol the crystallizable substance cedrin.

çē-drŏn'-dĭ-lą, s. [From Gr. κέδρον (kedron) the fruit of the cedar-tree, and Lat. dimin. suff. -ella.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: The inner roof, or upper horizontal or curved surface of an apartment opposite the floor, usually finished with plaster-work.

2. Fig.: Applied to any covering, as to the sky as the roof of the earth.

"O'er heaven's expanse like one blank ceiling spread."
Pope: Homer's Iliad, xvi. 365.

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: The upper surface of a room. Ceilings may be plane, domed, cylindrical or groined, coved, &c. (See these words.)

2. Shipbuilding: That portion of the inside skin of a vessel between the deck-beams and the timber-strakes on each side of the keelson. Also called the foot-waling. The strakes of the ceiling immediately below the shelf-pieces which support the deck-beams are called clamps. The outside planking is distinctively called the skin. (Knight.) ceiling-joists, s. pl.

Carp.: Small beams which are either mortised into the sides of the binding-joists, or notched upon and nailed up to the under sides of these joists. The last mode diminishes the height of the room, but is more easily executed, and is by some thought not so liable to be shaken by the plaster as when the ends of the ceiling-joists are inserted into pulley mortises. (Gwilt.)

çēil'-ĭnged, a. [Eng. ceiling; -ed.] Furnished or finished with a ceiling.

çeinte, *çein'-ture, s. [CINCTURE.]

"Upon a grene bow a ceinte of silke she bente."
Gower, C. A., ii. 2.

çĕl-ĕ-brĕnt, s. [A coined word of no etym.]

Logic: A syllogism having the second proposition a universal affirmative, and the other two universal negatives, as "no animals are devoid of sense: all men are animals: therefore, no men are devoid of sense." (BARBARA.)

çē-lās-trā'-çē-æ, s. pl. [Lat. celastr(us) and fem. pl. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Spindle-trees, a natural order of calycifloral polypetalous dicotyledons, classed by Lindley in his Rhamnal alliance. They are shrubs or small trees, and are widely spread. There are two sub-orders: (1) Evonymeæ, fruit dry and capsular; (2) Elæodendreæ, fruit drupaceous or cherry-like. They are all more or less acrid in their properties. They have a beautiful scarlet aril, which is derived from the sides of the opening in the seed. The wood of the European Spindle-tree is used in the manufacture of powder in France. There are three-and-five known genera and 300 species.

çē-lās'-trŭs, s. [Gr. κηλαστρος (kēlastros) = privet or holly.]

Bot.: A genus of plants the typical one of the order Celastraceæ. Celastrus scandens is a climbing North American shrub popularly known as Bitter-sweet or Wax-work. The seeds possess narcotic and stimulating qualities, while the bark is purgative and emetic. The scarlet-coated seed of C. paniculatus, a common Brazilian species, yields an oil which is used for burning in lamps. All the plants are widely spread.

çĕl-ē-brănt, s. [Lat. celebrans, pr. par. of celebro.] One who celebrates or officiates in any solemn office; especially applied to the priest who says Mass, or the cleric who administers the Holy Communion according to the Anglican rite.

"They had their orders of clergy, bishops, priests, and deacons; their readers and ministers; their celebrants and altars; their hymns and litanies."—Newman: Development of Christian Doctrine, ch. iv., § 2.

çĕl-ē-brāte, v.t. [Lat. celebratum, sup. of celebro = to frequent, solemnise; celeber = frequented, populous.]

I. Generally:

1. To perform or keep with solemn rites.

"Ye shall celebrate it in the seventh month."—Lev. xxiii. 41.

2. To commemorate in any set form, either of joy or sorrow.

"This pause of power 'tis Ireland's hour to mourn;
While England celebrates your safe return."
Dryden: To the Duchess of Ormonde, 93.

3. To praise, extol, make famous or renowned.

"The songs of Sion were psalms and pieces of poetry, that adored or celebrated the supreme Being."—Addison.

II. Spec.: To say Mass or administer the Holy Communion according to the Anglican rite.

¶ Crabb thus distinguishes between to celebrate and to commemorate:—"Every thing is celebrated which is distinguished by any marks of attention, without regard to the time of the event, whether present or past; but nothing is commemorated but what has been past. A marriage or a birthday is celebrated; the anniversary of any national event is commemorated. . . . Celebrating is a festive as well as social act; it may be sometimes serious, but it is mostly mingled with more or less of gaiety and mirth: commemorating is a solemn act; it may be sometimes festive and social, but it is always mingled with what is serious and may be altogether solitary. . . . The Jews celebrate their feast of the Passover: as Christians, we commemorate the sufferings and death of our Saviour, by partaking of the Lord's Supper." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

Have brought about their annual reckoning."
Shakesp.: Love's Labour's Lost, v. 2.

II. Figuratively:

1. Surpassing earthly things in excellence, angelic, divine.

"Their fortitude and wisdom were a flame Celestial, though they knew not whence it came."
Cowper: Truth, 163.

2. Inspired.

"Such the bard's prophetic words, Pregnant with celestial fire."
Cowper: Boadicea.

B. As substantive:

1. Gen.: An inhabitant of heaven.

"For who can tell (and sure I fear it ill)
But that all are in some powres celestiall?
Spenser: F. Q., II. viii. 46.

"Thus affable and mild the prince precedes,
And to the dome th' unknown celestial leads."
Pope: Homer: Odyssey i. 168.

2. Spec.: A native of China.

* C. As adverb: In a celestial manner; divinely.

"In his face
Youth smiled celestial, and to every limb Suitable grace diffused."—Milton: P. L., iii. 636.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between celestial and heavenly: "... Celestial is applied mostly in the natural sense of the heavens; heavenly is employed more commonly in a spiritual sense. Hence we speak of the celestial globe, as distinguished from the terrestrial, of the celestial bodies, of Olympus as the celestial abode of Jupiter, of the celestial deities; but on the other hand of the heavenly habitation, of heavenly joys or bliss, of heavenly spirits and the like. There are doubtless many cases in which celestial may be used for heavenly in the moral sense, but there are cases in which heavenly cannot so properly be substituted for celestial." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

† çē-lĕs'-tĭ-ăl-ĭze, v.t. [Eng. celestial, and suff. -ize (q.v.).] To make celestial or heavenly. (Quar. Rev.)

çē-lĕs-tĭ-ăl-ĭsed, pa. par. & a. [CELESTIALIZE.]

† çē-lĕs-tĭ-ăl-lў, adv. [Eng. celestial; -ly.] In a celestial or heavenly manner; divinely.

çē-lĕs'-tĭ-ăl-nĕss, s. [Eng. celestial; -ness.] The quality or state of being celestial or heavenly çē-lĕs'-tĭ-fĭed, pa. par. & a [CELESTIFY.]

 çē-lĕs'-tĭ-fў, v.t. [Lat. cœlestis = heavenly, and fio = to be made, fieri = to make.] To celestialize or convert into a heaven.

"Heaven but earth terrestrified, and earth but heaven celestified."—Browne: Vulg. Err., bk. iv., ch. xiii.

 çē-lĕs'-tĭ-fў-ĭng, pr. par., a., & s. [CELESTIFY.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: The act of making celestial çē-lĕs'-tĭn, çē-lĕs'-tīne (1), s. [CELESTINES.] One of the order of monks known as Celestines (q.v.).

çē-lĕs'-tīne (2), s. [From Lat. cœlestis = (1) heavenly, (2) sky-blue; Fr. célestine; Ger. colestin.]

Min.: Native sulphate of strontia, $SrO.SO_3$. It occurs in prismatic or tabular crystals, belonging to the rhombic system. Sp. gr., 4. Its name refers to the sky-blue colour sometimes presented by it. It is pretty widely distributed. By the action of nitric acid it is converted into nitrate of strontia, which is used for red-fire in theatres, fireworks, &c. It is called also Celestite.

Cĕ lĕs tines, s. [From Pope Celestine V.]

Eccles. Hist.: A monastic order instituted about 1254 by Pietro di Morone, afterwards Pope Celestine V. Their first convent was at Morone, in the Apennines of Abruzzo. The order was a reform of that of St. Bernard. It became a very rich order both in France and Italy. In 1776-8 it was suppressed by Pope Pius VI.

çĕl'-ĕs-tīte, s. [From Lat. cælest(is) = heavenly, and Eng., &c. suff. -ite (Min.) (q.v.).]

Min.: The same as Celestine (q.v.).

çĕ-lĕs-tĕ-bär'-īte, s. [First called baryto-celestine. Then the relative position of the two words were reversed. From celestine, o connective, and Eng. barite (q.v.).]

Min.: A variety of barite containing much sulphate of strontian. Found in Switzerland.

çĕ'-lĭ-ăc, cœ'-lĭ-ăc, * çĕ'-lĭ-ăck, a. [Lat. cœliacus, from Gr. κοιλος (koilos) = hollow.] Relating to the abdomen, ventricular. In anatomy applied to the arteries and nerves thereof.

"The blood moving slowly through the cœliack and mesenterick arteries, produces complaints."—Arbuthnot On Aliments.

çĕl'-ĭ-băçe-ў, s. [Lat. cælibatus, from cœlebs = an unmarried man, single.] The state of being unmarried, single life. (Atterbury.)

* çĕl'-ĭ-bāt-āire, s. [Fr.] A bachelor.

"The despairing celibataire descanted on his whole course of love."—Godwin Mandeville, ii. 208.

* çĕl-ĭ-bāt-ăr'-ĭ-ăn, s. [Eng. celibat(e), and suff. -arian.] A celibate.

çĕl'-ĭ-bāte, s. & a. [Lat. cælibatus. Celibacy.]

A. As substantive:

* 1. Single life, celibacy.

"If any persons, convict of this unchastity, are in the state of celibate, they are only chastised with mourges."—L. Addison: Description of West Barbary, p. 173.

2. One who devotes himself to a single life, a bachelor.

B. As adj.: Unmarried, single.

* çĕl'-ĭ-bāte, v.i. [Celibate, s.] To lead a life of celibacy.

"The males oblige themselves to celibate, and their multiplication is hindered."—Grauut.

* çĕl'-ĭ-bāt-ĭst, s. [Eng. celebat(e); -ist.] A celibate. (For. Quar. Rev.)

* çĕl'-ĭ-bīte, s. [Lat. cœlebs (genit. cœlibis) = single, unmarried.] The same as Celibate, s.

çœl'-ĭ-çŏll, a. [Lat. cœlicus = heavenly; from cœlum = heaven.] Heavenly, celestial.

"Furth of his palice riall ischit Phebus,— Defoundand from his sege etherial
Glade influent aspectis celicoll." Douglas: Virgil, Prol., 388, 47.

çĕl-ĭ-dŏg'-raph-ў, s [Fr. célidographie, from Gr. κηλις (kēlis) = a spot, and γραφω (graphō) = to write.] A description or treatise of the spots on the sun. (Crabb.)

* çĕl'-ĭ-dŏn-ў, * çĕl'-ў-dŏn-ў, s. [Chelidonium.]

Bot.: A plant, Chelidonium majus. (Prompt. Parv.)

çĕll, * çĕlle, * çœle, s. & a. [O. Fr. celle; Lat. cella.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) A small room or apartment in a monastery or convent inhabited by a person devoted to religion.

"A moche of a celle."
Robert of Gloucester, p. 267.

(2) A small room in a prison or asylum.

"... regarded as fit only for a cell in Saint Luke's."—Macaulay Hist. Eng., ch. xxiii.

* (3) A small religious house, attached to a monastery or convent.

"As loud as doth the chapell belle,
"There as this lord was keeper of the celle."
Chaucer: C. T., 173.

(4) A cottage, or small place of residence.

"In cottages and lowly cells."
Somerville Epitaph on Hugh Lumber.

(5) A small cavity or hollow place.

"The brain contains ten thousand cells."
Prior: Alma, iii. 162.

2. Fig.: A place of existence, a seat.

"Mine eyes he closed, but open left the cell
Of fancy, my internal sight."
Milton: P. L., viii. 460.

II. Technically:

1. Entom.: The compartments of a honeycomb.

2. Bot.: The substance of plants is not homogeneous, but is composed of small structures, generally indistinguishable by the naked eye; and each of those, at least for a time, is a whole complete in itself, being composed of solid, soft, and fluid layers, different in their chemical nature, and disposed concentrically from without inwards. These structures are termed cells. For the most part, a group of them is in close contact, and firmly united; they then form a cell-tissue. Each cell fulfils its own definite part in the economy of the plant, and shows a variety in form corresponding to the different functions. By far the largest proportion of cells in the living succulent parts of plants are seen to be made up of three concentrically-disposed layers: first, an outer skin, firm and elastic, called the cell-wall or cell-membrane, consisting of a substance peculiar to itself. [Cellulose.] The second layer is soft and elastic, and always contains albuminous matter. [Protoplasm.] And thirdly, the cavity enclosed by the protoplasm-sac is filled with a watery fluid called cell-sap.

3. Anat. & Zool.: A term often applied to any small cavity but properly restricted to a microscopical anatomical element with a nucleus cell-wall and cell-contents when typically formed. (Huxley.) The animal cell is ordinarily a closed sac, the environing membrane almost always consisting of a nitrogenous compound. The sac generally contains a liquid or semi-fluid protoplasm, in which are suspended molecules, granules, globules, or other very minute cells. Along with these are nuclei, which again contain nucleoli. [Nucleus, Nucleolus.] Cells may be formed from a protoplasm existing without the cell or within other cells. Or they may be made within others by what has hence been called an endogenous method or by division or in other ways. (Griffith & Henfrey.)

4. Arch., &c.:

(1) The space between the two ribs of a vault.

(2) The space enclosed within the walls of an ancient temple.

5. Iron-working: A structure in a wrought-iron beam or girder; a tube consisting of four wrought-iron plates riveted to angle-iron at the corners.

6. Elect.: A single jar, bath, or division of a compound vessel containing a couple of plates, say copper and zinc, united to their opposites or to each other usually by a wire. [Galvanic Battery.]

B. As adjective: (See the compounds).

cell-bred, a. Bred in a cellar or poor cottage, low born.

"Around him wide a sable Army stand,
A low-born, cell-bred, selfish, servile band."
Pope: Dunciad, bk. ii., 344-6.

cell-cavity, s.

Bot. Physiol.: The hollow internal part of a cell.

cell-contents, s. pl.

Bot. Physiol.: Substances contained in cells. Of solid substances there are pigments, starch, crystalline formations, aleurone, and resin; of fluids, oil, caoutchouc, viscin, and gutta percha, with sugar, tannic acid, and inuline dissolved in water. (Thomé: Botany, ed. Bennett.)

cell-division, s.

Bot. Physiol.: The division of a plant cell into two as the plant develops.

cell-door, s. & a. (See the compound).

Cell-door lock: A prison-door lock, to whose bolt no access is possible from the inside, and which may fit in a rabbet in the door-jamb.

cell-family, s.

Bot. Physiol.: A group of cells genetically and organically united. They have originated from a single "mother-cell." (Thomé: Botany, ed. Bennett.) cell-fluids, s. pl.

Bot. Physiol.: The fluids in the cells of plants. [Cell-contents.]

cell-formation, s.

Bot. Physiol.: The mode of origin and multiplication of cells. (Thomé.) cell-fusion, s.

Bot. Physiol.: Cells united into a group the elements, i.e. the separate cells, of which can still be recognised, and still possess a certain individuality. (Thomé.) cell-membrane, s.

Bot. Physiol.: [Membrane.]

cell-sap, s.

Bot. Physiol.: The watery fluid contain in a cell as distinguished from the mucil nous semi-fluid protoplasm.

cell-tissue, s.

Bot. Physiol.: [Tissue.]

cell-wall, s.

Bot. Physiol.: The wall of a cell surround its cavity.

¶ Some of the foregoing words may be u in an analogous sense of animal cells.

* çĕl'-lą, s. [Lat.] The interior space o temple.

çĕl'-lar, * çĕl'-ăr, s. [O Fr. celier; Lat larium.]

1. A vault or place underground wh liquors and stores are kept.

"Each band marched to the nearest manor sacked the cellar and larder of the minister Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

* 2. A case or box; a receptacle for bottl [Salt-cellar.]

"Run for the cellar of strong waters quickly Jonson: Mag. Lady, iii. 1

çĕl'-lar-āge, s. [Eng. cellar, and -age.]

1. That part of a building in which cellars are constructed; cellars.

"... you hear the fellow in the cellarage,— Consent to swear." Shakesp. Hen. V.

2. The charge made or money paid for storage of goods in a cellar.

çĕl'-lar-ĕr, * çĕl'-lèr-ĕr, * çĕl-ĕr-ĕr, [Eng. cellar; -er.] The officer in a n appointed to take charge of the stores butler.

"Upon my faith, thou art some officer
Some worthy sexton, or some cellerer." Chaucer Monk's Prol.

çĕl'-lar-ĕt', s. [Eng cellar, and dimin suff A small case with compartments for hol bottles. (Smart.)

† çĕl'-lar-ĭng, s. [Eng. cellar; -ing.] age.

"... a retired and peaceful cottage, situated delightful sporting country, with attached ou tached offices, roomy cellaring, and commodio tion."—Horton: Secret's worth Knowing iii. 4

* çĕl'-lar-ist, s. [Eng. cellar; -ist.] The cer in a religious house who had charge of provisions, &c.; a cellarer.

† çĕl'-lar-ŏŭs, a. [Eng. cellar; -ous.] longing to a cellar, subterranean, sunk

"A little side-door . . . stood open and disc tain cellarous steps."—Dickens: Uncom. Traveller çĕlled, a. [Cell.]

* 1. Confined in a cell

"Celled under ground."—Warner

2. Containing one or more cells.

It is distinguished by the mass globose and incrusting, or erect and branch calcareous polypidom, and the irregula heaped vasiform cells, vertical to the c mon plane, with a beak on one or both sid furnished with an avicularium. There are t British species. (Griffith & Henfrey.) çĕl-lĕ-pŏr'-ĭ-dæ, s. pl. [From Mod. L celleporı (q.v.), and fem. pl. adj suff. -idæ.] Zool.: A family of infundibulate Polyzoa the sub-order Cheilostoma. It contains single genus Celleporı (q.v.).

çĕl-lĭf'-ĕr-ŏŭs, a. [Lat. cella = a cell; = to bear.] Having or containing cells çĕl'-lites, s. pl. [From Lat. cellıta. Sc from the cells which they inhabited.]

Ch. Hist.: An order of monks who arose Antwerp in the fourteenth century. T were called also the Brethren and Sisters Alexius, whom they had for their patron sa They specially attended to the visitation of sick and dying. They were sometimes cal Lollards (q.v.). (Mosheim.) cel-lo (ital.), cel-li (pl.) (c as ch), s. [Ital.] An abbreviation of violoncello.

cel-u-lar, a. & s. [Fr. cellulaire, from Lat. cellula, dimin. of cella = a cell.]

A. As substantive:

Bot.: A plant having no distinct stem nor leaves, but forming a cellular expansion of various kinds, which bears the organs of reproduction.

B. As adj.: Consisting of cells or little cavities.

cellular beam, s. An application of wrought iron, in which wrought-iron plates are riveted with angle-irons in the form of longitudinal cells, with occasional cross struts.

cellular pyrites, s.

Min.: A variety of Marcasite.

cellular quartz, s.

Min.: A variety of quartz. (Brit. Mus. Cat.)

cellular system, s.

Bot. Physiol.: The part of a plant which consists of cells (q.v.) (Lindley, &c.), or spiral vessels, or has a tendency to them, though till lately the latter were supposed to be confined to plants of higher organisation.

cellular theory, s. A theory according to which all the vegetable and animal tissues are derived from the union and metamorphosis of primitive embryonic cells.

cellular tissue, s.

1. Bot. Physiol.: A kind of tissue made up of a number of separate cells or minute bags adherent together. These, when first formed, are usually nearly globular or egg-shaped, but afterwards by pressure become flattened. It is often called parenchyma.

2. Animal Physiol.: Fibro-cellular connective or areolar tissue (q.v.). It is found filling interstices between the various organs in man and the lower animals.

cel-u-lā'-re-æ, s. pl. [Pl. of Mod. Lat. cellularis = cellular, from Class Lat. cella = a cell.]

Bot.: A name given to Cryptograms, from an erroneous notion that they are composed entirely of cells. Padina amongst fungi, and Conferva Melagonium amongst algæ, are excellent examples.

cel-u-lā'-ri-a, s. [Lat. cellul(a) = a little cell, dimin. of cella; and neut. pl. suff. -aria.]

Zool.: A genus of infundibulate Polyzoa (Bryozoa), of the sub-order Cheilostomata, and family Cellularidæ. It is distinguished by the jointed, branched, erect polypidom, with flat linear branches, the contiguous cells in two or three rows, perforated behind, and more than four between two joints, and the absence of avicularia and vibracula. There is one British species. (Griff. & Henfrey.) cel-u-lā'-ri-i-dæ, s. pl. [Lat. cellula, dimin. of cella = a cell.]

Zool.: A family of Corals, in which each polype is adherent in a corneous or calcareous cell, with thin walls.

cel-lu-lo-ri-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. cellularia, and fem. pl. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of infundibulate Polyzoa (Bryozoa), of the sub-order Cheilostomata. They are distinguished by the branched, erect polypidom, and the flat linear branches, with the cells in one plane. (Griff. & Henfrey.) cel-u-lā-ted, a. [Lat. cellul(a), and Eng. suff. -ated.] Formed or consisting of cells.

cell'-ule, s. [Fr. cellule, from Lat. cellula, dimin. of cella = a cell.] A little cell.

cel-u-lif'-er-ous, a. [Lat. cellula = a little cell; fero = to bear, and Eng. suff. -ous.] Bearing or producing cellules or little cells, or cellular tissue.

cel-u-line, a. & s. [Lat. cellula = a little cell, and suff. -ine (Chem.).] The same as Cellulose (q.v.).

cel-u-loid, a. & s. [Lat. cellula = a little cell, and Gr. εἶδος (eidos) = form, appearance.]

† A. As adjective:

Nat. Science: Having the form or appearance of one or more small cells.

B. As subst.: An ivory-like compound, which can be moulded, turned, or otherwise manufactured for various purposes for which, before its introduction, ivory and bone were employed. The process of manufacture is as follows: Paper, by immersion in sulphuric and nitric acids, is converted into nitro-cellulose. This product, after washing and bleaching, is passed through a roller-mill, with the addition of a certain quantity of camphor. Celluloid softens at 176° Fahr., when it can be moulded into the most delicate forms, to become hard when cold. It is very inflammable, unless blended with some chemical having an opposite property.

cel-lu'-lo-se, a. & s. [Lat. cellul(a) = a little cell; -ose.]

A. As adj.: Consisting of or containing cells.

B. As subst.: A substance of general occurrence, and constituting the basis of vegetable tissues. Its chemical formula is $C_{24}H_{40}O_{20}$ or $6(C_6H_{10}O_5) + HO$. It is in many respects allied to starch, and is changed into starch by the unaided action of heat, or by sulphuric acid, or caustic potash. Cellulose was long considered as peculiar to vegetable tissues, but it has been shown by Schmidt, Lowig, and others to exist in the tissues of tunicates and some molluscs. Pure cellulose is a ternary compound of carbon and the elements of water.

cel-lō'-si-a, s. [Gr. κήλεος (kēleos) = burning, from καίω (kaiō) = to burn, from the appearance of the flowers.]

Bot.: A genus of amaranthads, consisting principally of tropical annuals. The best known, Celosia cristata, the Cockscomb of our gardens, has astringent qualities.

* cel-lot'-o-my, s. [Fr. celotomie, from Gr. κήλη (kēlē) = a tumour, and τομή (tomē) = a cutting, from τεμνω (temnō) = to cut.]

Surg.: An operation for the radical cure of inguinal hernia, by ligature of the sac and spermatic cord.

cel-si-a, s. [Named in honour of Dr. Olaus Celsius, Professor of Oriental languages in the University of Upsal.]

Bot.: A small genus of linariads closely allied to Verbascum. The species are annuals or biennials, with entire or pinnatifid foliage, and spikes of bright yellow mullein-like flowers.

* cel-si-tude, s. [Lat. celsitudo = height, from celsus = high, lofty.]

1. Lit.: Height, altitude.

2. Fig.: Nobility, excellence.

Celt (1), Celt (1), s. [Lat. celti; Gr. κέλτοι (keltoi, keltai); Wel. celtiad = one dwelling in a covert, an inhabitant of the woods, from celt = cover, shelter; celu = to cover, shelter, akin to Lat. celo (Mahn.).] [Kelt.]

Anthrop.: One of an ancient race of Asiatic origin, who formerly inhabited a great part of Gaul, Italy, Spain, and Britain, and whose descendants still occupy the Highlands of Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and part of the North of France.

celt (2), celt (2), s. [From a pseudo-Lat. celtis, assumed as the nom. of celte, rendered "with a chisel" in the Vulgate (Job xix. 24). It is prob. a misreading of certe = certainly.]

1. The longitudinal and grooved instrument of mixed metal often found in Scotland.

2. A prehistoric stone implement or weapon of a wedge-like form.

¶ Though the primary application of the word celt was to the metallic implement, yet the stone celt (No. 2) is the older of the two.

Celt-i-be'-r-i-an, a. & s. [Lat. Celtiber, Celtibericus, from Celtiberia, a district of Spain.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining to Celtiberia or its inhabitants, the Celtiberi or Celts of the Iberus (Ebro), in Spain.

B. As subst.: A native or inhabitant of Celtiberia.

Celt'-ic, Celt'-tic, a. & s. [Lat. celticus; Gr. κελτικος (keltikos).]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the Celts or their language.

B. As subst.: The language of the Celts.

¶ Remains of the Celtic language survive in Gaelic, Erse or Irish, Manx, Welsh, and Armorican or Breton.

Celtic architecture, s.

Arch.: A type of architecture existent in this country before the Roman invasion. It is called also Druidic, but it is a question whether the structures classed under it are all really pre-Roman.

Celtic pipes, s. [Elfin pipes.]

Celtic province, s.

Zool.: The third of the geographical provinces through which Testaceous Molluscs are distributed. Prof. E. Forbes described it as including the coasts of Britain, Denmark, Southern Sweden, and the Baltic.

cel'-ti-cism, s. [Eng. celtic; -ism.] A custom of the Celts, or an idiom of their language.

cel'-tis, s. [Lat. celtis, the name for an African species of Lotus.]

Bot.: A genus of Ulmaceæ (Elms) known as Nettle-trees. The fruit of the European Nettle-tree, Celtis australis, has been supposed by some to be the Lotus of classic myth. The tree grows on both sides of the Mediterranean. The Celtis.

1. End of branch in fruit. 2. Flower with perianth removed. 3. Flower young branches are boiled, and the infusion used against dysentery and blennorrhœa. The kernel of the tree furnishes a useful oil. The seeds of Celtis occidentalis of America, there called the Nettle-tree or Sugar-berry, are given in dysentery, while the root, bark, and leaves of Celtis orientalis are used by native physicians as remedies in cases of epilepsy. (Lindley, &c.)

* cel'-ure, s. [O. Fr. celeure (not found), from Lat. celatura = carving in relief.] A canopy or hanging round a bed or throne.

* ce-ly, a. [Silly.] Simple, innocent. (Chaucer.)

* cel'-y-don-y, s. [Celidon.]

"Celydony, herbe. Celidonia."—Prompt. Parv.

* cel-yn, s.t. [Seal.]

"Celyn lettera. Sigillo."—Prompt. Parv.

* ce-lyph'-us, s. [From Gr. κέλυφος (keluphos) = a husk, a rind, a pod or shell of a fruit.]

Entom.: A genus of dipterous insects of the family Lauxaniæ. The antennæ are wide apart, as long as the head, stylet rather thick and covered with fine hairs; scutellum convex and covering the abdomen. The species have more the appearance of little beetles than diptera, owing to the immense size of the scutellum. Only two species are known, Celyphus obtusus, a native of Java, and C. scutatus, a native of the East Indies.

* ceme, s. [Seam (2), s.] A quarter of corn.

"Ceme or quarter of corne. Quarterium."—Prompt. Parv.

* ceme-ly, a. & adv. [Seemly.]

* ceme-lyn, v. [Assemble, Semble.]

* ceme-ly-nesse, s. [Seemliness.]

ce-ment', * ci-ment, * cy-ment, * sy-ment, s & a. [O. Fr. cement; Fr. ciment; Sp. & Ital. cemento; Lat. cementum = coarse stones, rubble, an abbreviation of cædimentum, from cædo = to cut.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) Gen.: Matter with which two bodies are joined together.

"Thei hadden tiles for stoons, and tough clay for cyment."—Wycliffe: Gen. xi. 3.

(3) Spec.: [II. 1.]

2. Fig.: Anything which forms a bond of union socially or morally.

"For lust, this social cement of mankind,
The greatest empires, by excess decay."
Thomson: Liberty, pt. v.

¶ In some of the poets the accent is on the first syllable, both in the noun and verb.

II. Technically:

1. Building: Of cements there are many varieties, according to the special needs of different trades. In building the principal are known as Portland and Roman.

(1) Portland Cement was patented in England by Joseph Aspdin in 1824. It is so called because it resembles in colour Portland-stone. It is manufactured by calcining a mixture of slayed mud from the Thames with a proper proportion of chalk. The calcined mass is then reduced to a fine powder, and intimately mixed with the addition of water. The resulting paste is moulded into bricks, dried and burnt. The heat during the process of calcining must be a white heat, otherwise the carbonic acid and water may be expelled without the reaction between the lime and the clay necessary for the production of cement. The material is then assorted, all which has been too much or too little calcined being set aside and pulverized.

(2) Roman Cement is a name given to certain hydraulic mortars, varying considerably in their chemical composition, though physically possessing the same general character. It is an argillaceous lime, manufactured from a dark brown stone, a carbonate of lime with much alumina, found in the Island of Sheppey. The stone is calcined and mixed with sand in various proportions. Any limestone containing from fifteen to twenty per cent. of clay will, when properly prepared, form this cement. Calcine any ordinary clay and mix it with two-thirds its quantity of lime, grind to powder, and calcine again. The epithet Roman is improperly given, since the preparation was entirely unknown to the Romans.

(3) Hydraulic Cement is a kind of mortar used in building piers and walls under or exposed to water. There are many varieties. Hamelin's is composed of ground Portland-stone sixty-two parts, sand thirty-five, and litharge three.

Seems to imply a censure on the rest."
Cowper: Table Talk.

II. Old Law: A custom in certain manors, under which all under sixteen years of age were obliged to swear fealty to their lord, to pay twopence per head, and a penny per annum ever after, as cert-money, or common fine. [Cert-money.]

çen-sure (2), s. [Censura.]

çēn-sure (s as sh), v.t. & i. [Censure, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To form or give a judgment or opinion regarding anything without its being implied that this award was unfavourable.

"His voyage was variously censured; the Templars who commented not to the peace, flouted thereat."—Fuller: The Holy War, vol. iv. ch. 2.

¶ It is not creditable to man's candour in judging of others that the word censure in process of time became limited to the pronouncing of unfavourable judgments, these having from the first been so much more numerous than favourable verdicts that the word censure ceased to be applied to the latter at all.

* 2. To condemn judicially, to sentence.

"Has censured him
Already, and, as I hear, the provost hath
A warrant for his execution."
Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, i. 5.

3. To blame, to find fault with, to reprimand.

"To censure Homer, because it is unlike what it was never meant to resemble, . . ."—Pope: Homer's Odyssey, Postscript.

B. Intrans.: To form or give an opinion, to judge (followed by on).

"'Tis a passing shame,
That I, unworthy body as I am,
Should censure thus on lovely gentlemen."
Shakesp.: Two Gent. of Verona, ii. 4.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between to censure, to animadvert, and to criticise:—"To censure and animadvert are both personal, the one direct, and the other indirect; criticism is directed to things and not to persons only. Censuring consists in finding some fault real or supposed; it refers mostly to the conduct of individuals. Animadvert consists in suggesting some error or impropriety; it refers mostly to matters of opinion or dispute. Criticism consists in minutely examining the intrinsic characteristics and appreciating the merits of each individually or the whole collectively; it refers to matters of science and learning. To censure requires no more than simple attention; its justice or propriety often rests on the authority of the individual. animadversions require to be accompanied with reasons. . . . Criticism is altogether argumentative and illustrative. . . ."

(2) He thus distinguishes between to censure, to carp, and to cavil:—"To censure respects positive errors, to carp and cavil have regard to what is trivial or imaginary; the former is employed for errors in persons, the latter for supposed defects in things. Censures are frequently necessary from those who have the authority to use them. . . . Carping and cavilling are resorted to only to indulge ill-nature and self conceit. . . ."

(3) The distinction between to censure and to censure is thus stated:—"To censure is only to assert the guilt of another; to censure is to take that guilt for granted. . . . An accusation may be false or true, a censure mild or severe."

(4) For the difference between to blame and to censure, see Blame, v. (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

çēn-sured (s as sh), pa. par. & a. [Censure, v.]

C. As subst.: The act of blaming or reproaching; censure.

çĕn'-sŭs, s. [Lat. census, from censeo = to rate, to value.] The act of taking the numbers and other statistics of the population of any district or country, or of the members of any class or denomination.

"... from the account of the Roman census ..."—Bentley: Sermons, p. 397.

1. In Ancient Rome: The Census was established at Rome by Servius, and was held every five years in the Campus Martius. Every Roman citizen was obliged, on oath, to give in a statement of his own name and age, of the names and ages of his wife, children, slaves, and freedmen, if he had any. The punishment for a false return was that the person's goods should be confiscated, and he himself scourged and sold for a slave. Taxation depended upon the results of the Census.

2. In the United States: The first Census in the United States was taken in 1790, since which time it has been repeated regularly every ten years. In Great Britain the first Census was taken in 1801, and in Ireland in 1813. They have been repeated every ten years since.

census paper, s. A ruled paper left with the householder, or head of the family, to be filled up with the necessary particulars, and handed back to the enumerator when called for.

çĕnt (1), s. [An abbreviation of Lat. centum = a hundred. It is generally a part of a combination or phrase, as five per cent. = five by the hundred. In "cent per cent," however, it is a separate word.]

I. Ord. Lang.: A hundred.

"And bought with them many cent cent
Of great lordyngas." Gulelmus, 1460.

The demon makes his full descent
In one abundant shower of cent per cent."
Pope: Moral Essays, iii. 272.

II. Technically:

1. A coin, made of copper or copper and nickel, in circulation in the United States. It is of the value of ten mills or the hundredth part of a dollar, and about equal to a half-penny English.

2. A game at cards, resembling picquet, so called because one hundred was the winning number.

* çent (2), s. [SCENT.]

* çĕn'-tăge, s. [Eng. cent; -age.] Rate by the hundred; rate of interest or commission (only now used in the compound per-centage).

† çĕnt'-ăl, s. [Lat. centum = a hundred.] A weight of 100 lbs. avoirdupois, in use for corn at Liverpool. [QUINTAL.]

"A Council meeting of the Central Chamber of Agriculture was held yesterday, at which a resolution in favour of the central weight of 100 lb. as the standard was adopted, together with one memorialising the Board of Trade to duly verify the central as a new imperial denomination and provide a standard of one half that weight."—Daily News, Nov. 5, 1875.

* çĕn-tĭf-ĭd-ŏŭs, a. [Lat. centum = a hundred; findo = to cut, to divide, and Eng. -ous.] Divided into a hundred parts. (Scott.)

çĕn-tĭ-fō'-lĭ-ŏŭs, a. [Lat. centifolius = hundred-leaved; centum = a hundred, folium = a leaf.] Having a hundred leaves. (Johnson.) çĕn'-tĭ-grāde, a. [Fr. centigrade, from Lat. centum = a hundred, and gradus = a step, a degree.] Divided into a hundred degrees.

centigrade thermometer, s. A thermometer graduated on the scale of Celsius according to which the freezing point (Fahrenheit) is marked zero, and the boiling point (= 212° Fahrenheit) 100°. [THERMOMETER.]

çĕn'-tĭ-grăm, çĕn'-tĭ-grămme, s. [Fr. centigramme; cent = a hundred, gramme = a grain; from Lat. centum = a hundred, and gramma=a grain.] [GRAM, GRAMME.] A measure of weight, being the hundredth part of a gramme, and equal to 1·5433 of a grain troy or ·16024 of a grain avoirdupois.

çĕn'-tĭ-lĭ-tẽr, çĕn'-tĭ-lĭ-tre, s. [Fr. centilitre; cent = a hundred, litre = a measure of capacity or volume.] A measure of capacity or volume, being the hundredth part of a cubic or a little more than six-tenths of a cubic inch.

* çĕn-tĭl'-ō-quy (quy as kwy), s. [Lat. centum = a hundred; loquor = to speak.] A work composed by Ptolemy, and so called from its consisting of a hundred aphorisms or sayings.

"Ptolemeus, in his centiloquy, attributes all the symptoms which are in melancholy men to celestial influences."—Burton: Anat. of Mel. p. 178.

çĕn-tĭ-me, s. [O. Fr. centime, Fr. centime, from Lat. centesimus = of or containing the hundred, hundredth.] A small French copper coin, the hundredth part of a franc.

çĕn-tĭm'-ē-tẽr, çĕn'-tĭ-mē-tre, s. [Fr. centimètre, from Lat. centum = hundred, centum = a thousand.] A French measure of length, the hundredth part of a metre, that is rather more than ·39 of an inch.

"The Units Committee of the British Association have recommended that all specifications shall be referred to the centimetre-gramme-second system. The system of units derived from these as the fundamental units is called the C G S system, and the units of the system are called the C G S units."—Jevons: The C. G. S. System of Units (ed 1876), ch. ii. p. 16

centi-metre-meter, s. [METRE-METER.]

†cen-ti-nel, s. [SENTINEL.]

†cen-tin-er, s. [CENTENIER.]

cen-ti-pe-da, † cen-ti-ne-dy, s. [Fr. centipède; O. Fr. centipedie: Lat. centum = a hundred, nodus = a knot.] A kind of grass of the genus Illecebrum, a purslane-like plant; knotweed

†cen-ti-ped, cen-ti-pede, s. [Fr. centipède; Lat. centipeda = hundred-footed; from centum = a hundred, and pes (genit. pedis) = a foot.]

Zool.: An articulated animal having, in the popular estimation, 100 feet, but scientific men do not guarantee the number. It is opposed to a millepede, i.e., an animal with 1,000 feet, a number no more guaranteed than the former. The real distinction between them is that the Centipedes have only one pair of legs from each ring or "somite" of the body, while in the Millepedes there are to each somite, except the anterior five or six, two pairs. The Centipedes constitute the order Chilipoda, of the class Myriapoda (q.v.). The feet are generally from fifteen to twenty pairs, and the joints of the antennæ not less than fourteen.

cen-tip-é-dal, a. [Lat. centum = hundred, pedalis = of a foot long, from pes (genit. pedis = a foot.] Of a hundred feet in length.

cen-ti-pee, s. The same as CENTIPEDE (q.v.).

cen-t-ner, s. [Ger. centner = a hundredweight, from Lat. centenarius = of or pertaining to a hundred, centum = a hundred.]

1. A weight of one hundred pounds, used in some parts of England and Germany.

The Liverpool corn measure of 100lb., called a quarter, he proposes as the unit of measure."—Standard, March 15, 1881

2. A weight of a drachm, divided into a hundred equal parts.

cen-tō, cen-tone (or as chĕn-tō'-nē), s. [Lat. cento = a garment made up of several pieces joined together, patchwork.]

1. A composition consisting of verses or passages from different authors arranged in a new order.

"Centones are pieces of cloth of divers colours. . . . Meta horizontalis is a poem patched out of other poems by old verses."—Vives: Augustines City of God, bk. xvii. ch. xiii. note ¶ Becoming at length naturalised in our tongue, it dropped the Latin plural centones and took the English one centos in its room. (Trench: On some Def. in our Eng. Dict., p. 28.)

"From different patterns next the centos crowd."—Cambridge Scholarship, bk. ii.

2. Music: An opera or musical composition made up of selections from other pieces; a musical medley.

cen-tō-o-lā-tēd, a. [Lat. centum = a hundred, oculatus = having eyes, from oculus = an eye.] Having a hundred eyes.

cen-tōn-ism, s. [Lat. cento (genit. centonis) and Eng. suff. -ism.] The act or art of making up a composition from selections out of other authors; compilation.

cen-trāl, a. [Lat. centralis = pertaining to the centre, from centrum = the centre.]

1. Relating to the centre, containing the centre.

2. Situated in or at the centre.

"Palmyra, central in the desert . . . fell."
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. viii.

Anat.: That which, given off by the ophthalmic, insinuates itself into the optic nerve in its passage to the retina.

Astron.: A central-eclipse is when the centres of the heavenly bodies, which are affected, exactly coincide, or are directly in a line with the spectator.

* 1. As substantive:

Alchemy: The fire which alchemists formerly imagined to be in the centre of the earth, the fumes and vapours of which, as they supposed, made the metals and minerals.

2. As adjective:

Gunmaking: Constructed for the use of centre-fire cartridges. [CENTRE-FIRE.]

central forces, s. pl.

Mech.: The two antagonistic forces (centrifugal and centripetal) by whose united action bodies are caused to revolve round a central point.

cen-trel-ism, s. [Eng. central; -ism.] The same as centralization (q.v.).

†cen-trel-ist, s. [Eng. central; -ist.] One in favour of the policy of centralization.

cen-trăl-i-ty, s. [Low Lat. centralitas, centralis = pertaining to a centre, centrum = a centre.] The state or quality of being central.

"An actual centrality, though as low as next to nothing."—More: Notes upon Dan. Isaiah, p. 50

cen-tral-is-ā-tion, cen-tral-i-zā-tion, s. [Eng. centralize; -ation.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The act of making central.

2. Political: The system or policy of carrying on all Government at one central spot instead of locally. [CENTRALISM.]

cen-trel-ize, cen-trel-ize, v.t. [Eng. central; -ize.]

1. Gen.: To make central, to bring to a centre.

2. Spec.: To concentrate in some particular part, as an actual or conventional centre: (generally applied to the process by which the municipal or local administration of a country is overridden by the administration of the court or capital).

"... his attempt to centralize the power of the government."—Finlay: Greek Revolution, bk. v., ch. iv.

cen-trel-lās'-site, s. [From Gr. κέντρον (kentron) = a sharp point, a centre, and ἀλλάσσω (allassō) = to change.]

Min.: A white or yellowish-white pearly mineral found near Black Rock, at the Bay of Fundy. Compos.: Silica, 58·80; alumina, 1·4; magnesia, 0·16; lime, 27·92; potassa, 0·59; water, 11·42. (Dana.) cen-trel-ly, adv. [Eng. central; -ly.] As regards the centre; in a central manner.

cen-trăn-thus, s. [Gr. κέντρον (kentron) = a spur; ἄνθος (anthos) = a flower.]

Bot.: Spurred Valerian, a small genus of plants of the order Valerianaceæ, much used for borders in gardens. Centranthus ruber grows in the South of England apparently but not really wild. It comes from the south of Europe and north of Africa.

cen-trā-tion, s. [Lat. centrum = a centre.] A tendency to approach the centre.

"What needs that numerous cloud centration Like wasteful sand y'mot with boisterous inundation?"
More: Song of the Soul

cen-tre (tre as tĕr), cen-tĕr, s. & a. [Fr. centre; Sp. & Ital. centro; Lat. centrum; Gr. κέντρον (kentron) = a prick, a goad, a centre, κεντέω (kenteō) = to prick, to goad.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) The middle point, that point from which all points on the circumference of any circle, real or imaginary, are equally distant. [III. (3).]

"This erthe . . . hath his centre after the laws of kinde."—Gower, iii. 92.

(2) The middle portion of anything.

"The market place, the middle centre of this cursed town."—Shakesp.: 1 Henry VI., iv. 2.

(3) A point of concentration; the point to which all things converge.

2. Figuratively:

(1) The point on which men's thoughts or minds are concentrated; the principal point.

"The centre of the diplomatic difficulty . . ."—Times, Nov. 13, 1876.

* (2) The earth.

"The heav'ns themselves, the planets, and this centre, Observe degree, priority, and place."
Shakesp.: Troilus & Cressida, i. 3.

* (3) The soul.

"Poor soul, the centre of my sinful earth."
Shakesp.: Sonnets, 146.

II. Technically:

1. Geom., Nat. Phil., &c.: [I. 1.]

2. Mech.: One of two conical steel pins on a lathe, on which the body to be turned is fixed and revolves.

3. Building:

(1) Any timber frame, or set of frames, for

CENTRE OF AN ARCH

supporting the archstones of a bridge during the construction of an arch. (Weale.)

(2) Pl. centres: The length of timber disposed in a certain way by the process called centering (q.v.).

4. Turnery (pl. centres): The two cones with their axes horizontally pointed for sustaining the body while it is turned. (Weale.)

III. Compound Terms:

(1) Centre of a bastion:

Mil.: A point in the middle of the gorge of the bastion, whence the capital line commences; it is generally at the inner polygon of the figure. (James.)

(2) Centre of a battalion on parade:

Mil.: The middle, where an interval is left for the colours. (James.)

(3) Centre of a circle:

Geom.: A point within a circle, and so situated that all straight lines drawn from it to the circumference are equal to one another.

(4) Centre of a conic section:

Geom.: The point which bisects any diameter, or the point in which all the diameters intersect each other. [Nos. 7 & 11.]

(5) Centre of a curve of the higher kind:

Geom.: The place where two diameters meet.

(6) Centre of a dial: That part where the gnomon or style, placed parallel to the axis of the earth, intersects the plane of the dial. (Weale.)

(7) Centre of a hyperbola:

Conic Sect.: The point of bisection of a straight line joining the foci.

(8) Centre of a regular polygon:

Geom.: A point so situated that the straight line drawn from it to the several angles of the polygon are equal to one another.

(9) Centre of a sphere:

Geom.: A point within a sphere, so situated that all the radii running from it to the circumference of the sphere are equal to each other. It is the centre also of every great circle of the sphere.

(10) Centre of a square:

Geom.: A point so situated that straight lines drawn from it to the several angular points of the square are equal to each other.

(11) Centre of an ellipse:

Conic Sect.: The point of bisection of a straight line joining the foci of an ellipse. [Nos. 4.]

(12) Centre of attack:

Mil.: An attack carried upon a capital in the middle, which generally lends to the half moon. The term is used when works with a considerable front upon three capitals are used in besieging a place. (James.)

(13) Centre of attraction:

Nat. Phil.: The point to which bodies tend through the attraction of gravity.

* The strength of a centre, called also the absolute force of a centre of attraction: The intensity of force at unit distance. Attraction being inversely as the square of the distance, the strength of a centre of attraction is = $\frac{L.s}{T^2}$, L standing for length, and T for time. (Everett: The C. G. S. System of Units, ed. 1875, ch. i., p. 6.)

(14) Centre of buoyancy:

Ship-building: The same as Centre of displacement (q.v.).

(15) Centre of gravity:

Ship-building: The same as Centre of displacement (q.v.).

(16) Centre of conversion:

Nat. Phil.: A point in a body about which it tends to turn, or turns when struck by another body.

(17) Centre of displacement:

Ship-building: The mean centre of the portion of the vessel immersed in the water. It is called also the Centre of gravity, immersion, or buoyancy.

(18) Centre of equilibrium in a series of connected bodies:

Nat. Phil.: A point so situated that if it be supported the whole series of bodies will remain at rest.

(19) Centre of forces:

Nat. Phil.: The point of application of a number of forces where they can be counteracted by a single force.

(20) Centre of friction:

Nat. Phil.: The point around which anything rotates.

(21) Centre of gravity:

Nat. Phil.: A point in any material body or system of particles rigidly connected which is so situated that if it be supported or fixed the body will remain at rest whatever be the position which the body itself may occupy at the [illegible].

(22) Centre of gyration:

Geom.: The point at which, if the whole matter in the body were collected, given forces would produce the same angular velocity of rotation in a given time as they would do if the particles of the body were distributed in their proper places. (Pen. Cyc.)

(23) Centre of immersion:

Ship-building: The same as Centre of displacement (q.v.).

(24) Centre of inertia:

Nat. Phil.: The same as Centre of gravity (q.v.).

(25) Centre of magnitude:

Nat. Phil.: A point in a body equally distant from all its external parts.

(26) Centre of motion:

Nat. Phil.: The point which remains at rest while all the other parts move about it.

(27) Centre of oscillation:

Nat. Phil., Pendulum, &c.: The point in which the whole of the matter must be collected that the time of the oscillation may be the same as when it is distributed.

(28) Centre of percussion:

Nat. Phil.: The point at which the force of the stroke is the greatest possible.

(29) Centre of position:

Nat. Phil.: The same as Centre of gravity (q.v.).

(30) Centre of pressure:

Nat. Phil.: The point at which the whole amount of pressure may be applied with the same effect as when it is distributed.

(31) Centre of pressure in a fluid against a plane:

Hydrostatics: A point so situated that it will just sustain a force equal and contrary to the whole pressure of the fluid.

(32) Centre of rotation:

Nat. Phil.: The point around which a body rotates, the centre of motion of a body.

(33) Centre of spontaneous rotation:

Nat. Phil.: The centre around which a body, every part of which is free to move, actually does so when struck by a force not passing through its centre of gravity.

B. As adjective: (See the compounds).

Mech.: An instrument turning on a centre, and having a projecting conical point. It is used for boring circular holes of various diameters. The head of the stock is pressed against the breast, and the stock itself caused to revolve swiftly by means of a handle.

centre-board, s.

Naut.: A board placed amidship in a well which extends longitudinally and vertically through the keel, and is adapted to be lowered to give a deeper draft, in order to avoid leeway and to give the vessel greater stability under press of canvas. It is the old Dutch lee-board in a central position. A sliding keel (Knight.) centre-chisel, s.

Metal.: A chisel used to make a dent at the exact centre, to form a starting-point for the drill, in drilling holes in metal. A pointed cold-chisel centre-chuck, s.

Turning: A chuck which can be screwed on the mandril of a lathe, and has a hardened steel cone or centre fixed on it, and also a projecting arm or driver.

centre-drill, s.

Turning: A small drill used for making a short hole in the ends of a shaft about to be turned, for the entrance of the lathe-[illegible].

centre fire, s. & a. (See the compound).

Centre-fire cartridge. A cartridge in which the fulminate occupies an axial position, instead of being around the periphery of the flanged capsule centre-gauge, s. A gauge for showing the angle to which a lathe-centre should be turned, and also for accurately grinding and setting screw-cutting tools centre-lathe, s.

1. A lathe in which the work is supported upon centres at each end; one on the end of the mandrel in the head-stock, and the other, the back-centre, on the axis in the tail-stock. The latter is adjustable.

2. A pole lathe; a lathe in which the work is held by centres projecting from two posts, and is driven by a band, which passes two or three times around it. The band is fastened at its respective ends to a treadle beneath the lathe and a spring bar above it. (Knight.) centre-line, s.

centre-phonic, a.

Acoustics: The place where the speaker stands in making polysyllabical and articulate echoes. (Weale.) centre-phonoscopic, a.

Acoustics: The place or object which returns the voice. (Weale.) centre-pin, s. The pivot on which the needle oscillates in a mariner's compass.

Joinery: A small piece of steel, with a hardened point at one end, used for making a small hole or indent.

Rail. Engineering: A third, or middle, rail placed between the ordinary rails of a track, and used on inclined planes in connection with wheels on the locomotive in ascending or descending the grade. (Knight.) centre saw, s. A machine for splitting round timber into bolts, instead of riving it, for axe and pick handles, and heavy spokes. It has a sliding carriage, furnished with centre head-blocks, upon which the log is placed; and is provided with a dial-plate and stops, by which the log can be spaced into stuff the desired size. The centres can be adjusted up or down, to suit the work. Is capable of splitting timbers up to 20 inches in diameter, 3½ feet long; cuts invariably toward the centre, and is calculated for a saw 22 inches or less in diameter. (Knight.) centre-second, s. A term applied to a watch or clock in which the second hand is mounted on the central arbor and completes its revolution in one minute. It is more easily read than the ordinary second-hand traversing in its own small dial. (Knight.) centre-valve, s. A device in gas works intended to distribute the coal-gas to the purifiers.

centre-volie, s. The centre of gravity of an equivalent sail, or that single sail whose position and magnitude are such as cause it to be acted upon by the wind when the vessel is sailing, so that the motion shall be the same as that which takes place while the [illegible] have their usual positions. (Weale.) Called also vole point.

centre-wheel, s. The "third wheel" in a watch in some kinds of movements cēn'-tre (tre as tẽr), cēn'-tẽr, v. [CENTER, s.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: To place in the centre.

"One fixed to centred, and the other turned [illegible]
Rotated through the vast profundity [illegible]
Wallis. P. L. viii.

2. Fig.: To collect or gather at one point; to concentrate

"He may take a range all the world over, and [illegible] all that wide air and the influences [illegible] and centre it in his own breast. Scott.

"But here our hopes are centred [illegible]
Sumner, Address on The Death of the Princess Alice, 1.

II. Optics: To grind an optic glass so that the thickest part shall be exactly in the [illegible]

B. Intransitive:

1. Lit.: To be placed or to stand in a centre.

"As God in Heaven
Is centre, yet extends to all, so thou
Centring receivest from all those orbs [illegible]
Milton. P. L. iii.

* II. Figuratively:

1. To rest or repose as a body in a state of equilibrium

"Where there is no visible truth wherein to centre, error is as wide as man's fancies, and may run [illegible] eternity.—Bacon of Plants.

2. To be collected to one point; to be concentrated "Death, for he can, and none so soon as he,

What treasures centre, what delights in the [illegible]
Sumner. B.

cēn'-tred (tred as tẽrd) or tẽr'-ed, tẽred, pa. par. or a. [CENTRE, v.]

* cēn-trĭ'-I-tȳ, s. [Eng. central; -ity.] The quality or state of being central. [illegible]

"In every thing conspicuous
Each part of the creation is the centre's g
Keeps to itself it shrinks not to a nullity
More. Song of the Soul, pt. ii. bk. ii. c. i

† cēn'-tre-mĕnt (tre as tẽr), s. [Fr. centre; -ment.] The centre, the chief point

"They fall at once into that state in which [illegible] persons becomes to me the very god and [illegible] God's creation.—Cowhill Magazine, On Fiction, Ancient and Modern.

* cēn'-trĭc, * cēn'-trĭck, * cēn'-trĭ-cal, a. & s. [Eng. centre; -ic, -ical] and suff. -ic, -ical.]

A. As adj.: Placed in the centre; [illegible]

"Rome, that [illegible] in more than [illegible] may where his centre'st has [illegible]

B. As subst. A circle having the centre as the centre

How girt the sphere
With centric and [illegible]
Milton. P. L. [illegible]

* cēn'-trĭ-cal-lȳ, adv. [Eng. centrical; -ly.] Centrally, in the centre

* cēn'-trĭ-cal-nĕss, s. [Eng. centrical; -ness.] The state or quality of being central.

* cēn-trĭc'-I-tȳ, s. [Eng. centric; -ity.] The same as CENTRICALNESS.

cēn-trĭf'-ū-gal, a. [Fr. centrifuge, from centrum = the centre, and fugio = to flee.]

1. Mech.: Having a tendency or [illegible] to recede from the centre. [CENTRIFUGAL FORCE.]

"They described an hyperbola [illegible] tripetal into a centrifugal force [illegible]

† 2. Botany:

(1) An epithet applied to that kind of florescence, which, like the cyme, flowers at the end and last at the base, called Determinate, Definite, or Terminal florescence. [CENTRIFUGAL INFLORESCENCE.]

"The expansions of the flowers in this case are fugal, that is, from apex to base, or from circumference.—Balfour, Botany, § 282.

(2) Having the radicle turned towards sides of the fruit.

centrifugal drill, s. A drill having a fly wheel upon the stock, to [illegible] steady the motion against the [illegible] porary impediments.

centrifugal filter, s. A filter cylinder of which has a porous or [illegible] periphery, and is very rapidly rotated on its vertical axis, so as to drive off by centrifugal force the liquid with which the substances contained in the cylinder is saturated.

centrifugal force, s.

Nat. Phil. The force which compels a revolving body from the centre to the circumference is central.

¶ Prof. Airy objects to the use of the term centrifugal force, saying that there is no force in operation. He proposes to substitute the expression "centrifugal tendency." — (Brief Acct. Prop. Astron., 6th ed., pp. 245 2.)

centrifugal gun, s.

Mil. A form of machine cannon in which balls are driven tangentially from a chamber of disk rotating at great speed.

centrifugal inflorescence, s.

Bot.: An inflorescence in which the terminal flower opens first and the lateral ones successively afterwards. (Paxton: Figures of World.)

CENTRIFUGAL INFLORESCENCE—RANUNCULUS.

centrifugal machine, s.

1. Hydraul.: A machine contrived to raise water by means of centrifugal force, combined with the pressure of the atmosphere.

2. Mech.: A machine for drying yarn, cloths, clothes, &c., by centrifugal action. The fibrous or other material is placed in a hollow cylinder with a reticulated periphery of wire gauze, and, being rotated at a rate of from 1,000 to 2,000 revolutions per minute, the water flies off by the centrifugal action, and is [illegible] the cylinder, down a [illegible] discharge-pipe. [illegible] ing. (Knight.) centrifugal pump, s. [illegible] CENTRIPETAL MACHINES, 1. Hydraul.

centrifugal radicle,

Bot.: An embryonic radicle which is turned away from the centre of a seed.

centrifugal sugar, s. A trade-name for sugar prepared in a centrifugal machine.

centrifugal tendency, s. A compound term designed to express the same idea as the more common one, centrifugal force (q.v.)

> A circular loop when [illegible] tending less than more [illegible] to the centrifugal tendency — Prof. Airy: Brief Acct. Prop. Astron., 6th ed., pp. 244-5.

çin trif' ū gal ly, adv. [Eng. centrifugal; -ly.]

1. Lit.: In a centrifugal manner.

2. Fig.: Spreading outwards.

> "The British Archipelago [has], as a whole, been physical nations on all sides, and pushes knowledge centrifugally outwards." — Pycraft: Prog. of Science, 1st ed., vi. 16.

çin-trif' ū-jənçe, s. [Eng. centrifug(al); -ence.] Centrifugal tendency (q.v.).

çint'-ring, çint'-ər-ing, a. & s. [Centre, v., -ing.]

A. As adj.: Tending or gravitating towards the centre.

B. As substantive:

1. Building: [CENTERING.]

2. Optics: The grinding of a lens, so that the thickest part is exactly in the middle.

çin trip'-ē-tăl, a. [In Fr. centripète, from Lat. centrum = centre, and peto = to seek.]

1. Mech.: Having a tendency to or causing to approach the centre; having gravity. It is the opposite of centrifugal (q.v.)

> "In the same manner the centrifugal force is not a centred force in a strict sense, but only a [illegible] of the first law of motion, measured [illegible] which counteracts [illegible]." — Rudiments of Science, &c. Edinb., i. 205.

2. Botany:

(1) An epithet for that kind of inflorescence which, like the spike or capitulum, flowers first at the base and last at the end or centre; called also Indeterminate, Indefinite, or Axillary inflorescence. [CENTRIPETAL INFLORESCENCE.]

> The expansion of the flowers is [illegible] that is from base to apex of [illegible] centre. — Balfour: Botany (1855), p. 93.

(2) Having the radicle turned towards the axis of the fruit.

3. Osteology: Progressing by changes from the exterior towards the centre, as [illegible] calcification of a bone. (Owen.) [illegible] centripetal force, s.

Nat. Phil.: A so-called force which tends to make a body move towards a centre.

Bot.: An inflorescence in which the lowest flowers open first and the main stem continues to elongate, developing fresh flowers. (Lindley: Veg. Kingd.)

CENTRIPETAL INFLORESCENCE—PRIMULA.

centripetal press, s. A mechanical contrivance for pressing inwardly on a central line from all directions in the common plane. (Knight.) centripetal pump, s. A pump in which the water is gathered by revolving blades or arms, and drawn to the axis from whence the discharge-tube rises. (Knight.)

Nat. Phil.: A name proposed by Prof Airy to designate what is now commonly called 'centripetal force,' but properly speaking is not a force but a tendency. (CENTRIPETAL FORCE.) Centripetal and centrifugal tendencies make the planets revolve around the sun in their present elliptic orbits. If centripetal [illegible] ceased, they would fly off into space; centrifugal action failed longer to operate, they would move with continually augmenting velocity towards the sun, against which it would ultimately impinge, with the [illegible] that everything in them combustible would be burnt.

çen trip'-ō tăl ly, adv. [Eng. centripet(al); -ly.] In a centripetal manner; by centripetal [illegible].

çen trip'-ē tən-çy, s. [Lat. centrum = centre, petens (genit. petentis), pr. par. of peto = to seek.] The quality of having a tendency to approach the centre. (Meath Rev.)

çen-tris'-əm, s. [Lat. centrum; Gr. κεντρισμος (kentrismos).]

Ichthy.: A genus of fishes of the family Fistularidæ or Aulostomidæ, having the head lengthened into a very narrow snout, mouth without teeth, gills broad and flat, body compressed, belly carinate, ventral fins [illegible] (Cuvier.) Centrisc. scolopax is the Trumpet-fish or Sea-snipe, called in Cornwall the [illegible] lowe Fish. It is about five inches long. Its habitat is in the Mediterranean. It has been found, though rarely, in the British seas.

çen-trō-bär'-ik, a. [Gr. κεντρον (kentron) = centre, and βαρος (baros) = weight, gravity.] Relating to the centre of gravity, or to the process of finding it.

Math.: A process invented for measuring or determining the quantity of any surface or solid, by considering it as generated by motion, and multiplying the generating line or surface into the path of its centre of gravity. It is sometimes called the Theorem of Pappus, and also, but incorrectly, Guldinus's properties.

çen-trō-car'-pus, s. [Gr. κεντρον (kentron) = a spur; καρπος (karpos) = a stalk.]

Bot.: A group of Compositæ, differing but slightly, if at all, from Rudbeckia (q.v.)

çen-trō-çĕl'-in-ĕ-æ, s. [From Gr. κεντρον (kentron) = a sharp point, a centre, κλινη (klinē) = a couch, a bed.]

Bot.: A genus of composite plants, with two-lipped corollas. The four known species are herbs or small shrubs found in the Peruvian Andes at an elevation of 8,000 to 9,000 feet. They have alternate leaves stalked, toothed, or entire, and covered beneath, as well as the stems, with a white tomentum. The flower heads are purple about an inch in diameter; the ray florets are few and female. Centrocletinum adpressum and C. rufescens are cultivated, and produce two-coloured flowers, smelling like hawthorn. (Treasury of Botany.)

çen-trō-lē'-pis, s. [Gr. κεντρον (kentron) = a spur; λεπις (lepis) = a scale.]

Bot.: A genus of Desvauxiaceæ, containing a few small tufted sedge-like herbs from Australia and Tasmania. Leaves grass-like, all radical; spikes short and terminated by a simple spike; glumes two, membranous; stamen one; ovaries two to twelve, becoming [illegible]-valves in fruit. (Treas. of Bot.) çen-trō-lĭn'-ē-ā, s. [Lat. centrum = centre; linea = a line.] An instrument for drawing lines converging to or passing through a point.

çen-trō-lin'-ē-al, a. & s. [Lat. centrum = centre, linealis = pertaining to a line, from linea = a line.]

A. As adj.: An epithet applied to lines converging to or meeting in a point or centre.

B. As substantive: A centre [illegible].

çen-trō-lō-bi'-ŭm, s. [Gr. κεντρον (kentron) = a spur; λοβος (lobos) = a head, a capsule.]

Bot.: A genus of leguminous trees from Brazil, Guiana, and Venezuela. The leaves are a foot or more in length, and clad with a rusty pubescence. The pod is the most remarkable part of the plant. It is like the fruit of the common maple. It is about nine inches in length, the lower or seed bearing portion cylindrical, and clad with long, straight prickles; the upper or winged portion thin, papery in texture, about 2½ inches broad, and bearing on its back a long, straight, sparred spine, which is the hard-wood stave. Centrolobium paraense furnishes one of the most esteemed timbers of the Orinoco; its colour is bright orange while fresh, fading to brown after exposure.

çen-trōl'-ō-phŭs, s. [Gr. κεντρον (kentron) = a goad, a spur; λοφος (lophos) = a crest.]

Ichthy.: A genus of fishes of the family Coryphænidæ, with elongated bodies, the dorsal fin commencing evenly with the pectoral; ventral fin small; anal fin half as long as the dorsal; vent central; lateral line prominent. Centrolophus niger is the "Black fish," rarely met with on the British coasts. It is intensely black above, especially on the fins. It is of a paler colour beneath.

çen-trō mĕl, s. [A corrupt form of centinel (q.v.).] A sentinel.

çen-trō-mĕr'-ē-ă, s. [Gr. κεντρον (kentron) = a [illegible] antlers being furnished with a [illegible].

[illegible]: a genus of plants of the order Melanostomaceæ, having large purple flowers.

çĕn trō nŏt' i dæ, s. pl. [From Mod. Lat. centronotus, one the typical genus; and fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ichthy.: A lapsed family of fishes, of which Centronotus (q.v.) was the type.

çĕn trō no' tŭs, s. [Gr. κεντρον (kentron) = a goad, a spur; νοτος (notos) = the back; so called from the fact that the dorsal fin is entirely composed of spines.]

Ichthy.: A genus of fishes, family Blennidæ, with ten species, of which one, C. gunellus, the Gunnel, or Butter-fish, is British. The body is elongate; dorsal (of spines only) and anal fins of equal length and falcated; caudal fin large and forked; scales minute.

çĕn trō-pē' gŏn, s. [Gr. κεντρον (kentron) = a spur, πωγων (pōgōn) = a beard.]

Bot.: A genus of Lobeliaceæ, natives of tropical America. All the plants are undershrubs with irregular flowers on long axillary stalks. It is alleged that the succulent fruit of Centropogon lucidus is eatable (Hamilton), though the Lobeliaceæ are generally dangerous.

çĕn trō-pō-mē, çĕn trō-pō-mŭs, s. [Gr. κεντρον (kentron) = a goad, a spur; and ωμα (ōma) = a lid, a cover.]

Ichthy.: A genus of fishes belonging to the Percidæ or Perch family. Centropristes undecimalis, the specific name of which refers to the fact that it has eleven rays to the posterior dorsal fin, frequents the mouth of some South American rivers. It is called by the English residents the Sea-pike, and is eaten.

cĕn-trō-prĭs'-tĭş, s. [Gr. κέντρον (kentron) = a spur; and πριστις (pristis) = a large fish, prob. the saw-fish (q.v.).]

Ichthy.: A genus of fishes belonging to the Percidæ or Perch family. Centropristis nigricans, one of the species called Black Perch or Black Bass, is abundant in the rivers of the United States, and is esteemed for the table.

cĕn-trō-pŭs, s. [Gr. κέντρον (kentron) = a spur, πους (pous) = a foot.]

Ornith.: A genus of birds belonging to the Coccyzinæ or Hooked-billed Cuckoos.

cĕn-trō-sĕ'-lē-nī-ą, s. [Gr. κέντρον (kentron) = a spur; σελήνη (selēnē) = the moon.]

Bot.: A genus of Gesneraceæ, from British Guiana. It consists of but a single plant, which has a short, creeping stem, subcordate, petiolate leaves, and solitary axillary peduncles. The calyx is five-parted, with serrate segments. It is distinguished from Nemetanthus, to which it is allied, by the spur of the flower, coupled with the habit and the toothed segments of the calyx. (Treas. of Botany.)

cĕn-trō-sē'-mą, s. [Gr κέντρον (kentron) = a spur; σῆμα (sēma) = a mark, a device.]

Bot.: A genus of leguminous prostrate or twining perennial plants, distinguished by having on the back and near the base of the standard a short spur. The species are entirely American, and are mostly found in Brazil. The large and elegant pea-like flowers are white, violet, rose, or blue in colour, single or in axillary racemes. The pods are very narrow, compressed, thickened at both sides, and terminating in a long point; in some species they are eight inches in length. Upwards of twenty species are known.

cĕn-trŭm, s. [From Mod. Lat. centrum; Gr. κέντρον (kentron) = a horse-goad, . . . the stationary part of a pair of compasses.]

Anat. & Zool.: A centre, applied specially to the "bodies" of vertebræ. (Huxley.) The central portion or "body" of a vertebra. (Nicholson.)

* cĕn-trў, s. [SENTRY.]

"The thoughtless wife shall frequent forfeits pay,
Who 'gainst the centry a box discharge their tea."
Gay.

cĕn-tŭm-vir (pl. cĕn-tŭm'-vir-ī), s. [An adaptation of Lat. centumviri: centum = a hundred; viri, nom. pl. of vir = a man.]

Rom. Antiq.: One of the centumviri or judges appointed by the prætor to decide common causes amongst the Romans. They were selected from the most learned in the law, and were elected from the thirty five tribes, three out of each tribe, so that their number really was one hundred and five, though, for the sake of the round number, called centumviri. They were afterwards increased in number to one hundred and eighty, yet still retained their original name.

cĕn-tŭm'-vir-ăl, a. [Lat. centumviralis = pertaining to the centumviri.] Pertaining to the centumviri or a centumvir. (Ash.) cĕn tŭm'-vir-ąte, s. [Fr. centumvirat; Lat. centumviratus.] The office or position of a centumvir. (Quar. Rev.)

cĕn-tŭn-cŭ-lŭs, s. [Lat. = bind-weed.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, order Primulaceæ. Centunculus minimus is the Bastard Pimpernel, a British annual weed with alternate ovate leaves and sessile flowers. A book-name for it is the Small Chaffweed.

cĕn'-tų-plc, a. [Fr. centuple; Lat. centuplex = a hundred-fold: centum = a hundred; plexus, pa. par. of plecto = to twist, to weave.] A hundred-fold. (Ben Jonson.)

* cĕn'-tų-plc, v.t. [CENTUPLE, a.] To multiply or increase a hundred fold.

"Then would he centuple thy former store,
And make thee far more happy than before."
Sandys Paraphr. of Job.

* cĕn-tū'-plic-ąte, v.t. [Lat. centuplicatus, pa. par. of centuplico = to make a hundred-fold: centum = a hundred; plico = to weave, to twist.] To make a hundred-fold, to repeat a hundred times.

* cĕn-tŭ'-plī-cā-tĭd, pa. par. or a. [CENTUPLICATE, v.] Made a hundred-fold, repeated a hundred times.

"I perform'd the civilities you enjoyn'd me to your friends here, who return you the like centuplicated, . . . —Howell, bk. iv., Let. 2.

* cĕn-tŭ'-plī-cā-tĭng, pr. par., a., & s. [CENTUPLICATE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & partic. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: The act of multiplying a hundred-fold.

* cĕn-tūr'-ī-ăl, a. [Lat. centuriālis = pertaining to a century; centuria = a century; centum = a hundred.] Pertaining to a century or a hundred. (Ritis. Cyc.)

* cĕn-tūr'-ī-ąn, s. [Eng. century; -an.] A centurion. (See example under centenier.)

* cĕn-tūr'-ī-ąte, v.t. [Lat. centuriatus, pa. par. of centurio.] To divide into centuries or hundreds. (Coles.)

* cĕn-tūr'-ī-ąte, a. [Lat. centuriatus, pa. par. of centurio.] Pertaining to, or divided into, centuries or hundreds.

"The centuriate assemblies."—Holland: Livy, bk. vi., ch. xii.

* cĕn-tūr-ī-ā'-tŏr, s. [Lat. centurio = to divide into centuries or hundreds.] A name given to historians who distinguish times by centuries, which is generally the method of ecclesiastical history. Used specially of the Magdeburg centuriators—viz., Matthias Flacius, John Wigand, Matthew Judex, Basil Faber, Andrew Corvinus, Thomas Holthunters, and others, who between A.D. 1559 and 1574 published a Church History in thirteen volumes, each volume comprising a century.

"The centuriators of Magdeburg were the first that discovered this grand imposture."—Aplyffe: Parergon.

* cĕn'-tų-rie, * cĕn'-tūr-ў (1), s. [CENTAURY.]

"Of laurel, century and fumytere."
Chaucer C. T., 14,448.

cĕn-tūr'-ī-ŏn, s. [Lat. centurio, from centum = a hundred.]

Roman Antiq.: A Roman military officer commanding a century or a company of infantry, consisting of one hundred men. He answered to our captain. (Mat. viii 5.)

* cĕn'-tų-rist, s. [Eng. century); -ist.] The same as CENTURIATOR (q.v.).

"You cannot justly join Osiander and the centurists with the heathens."—Sheldon: Miracles of Antichrist, p. 105.

cĕn'-tų-rў (2), s. [Lat. centuria, from centum = a hundred.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) An aggregate number of a hundred of things.
